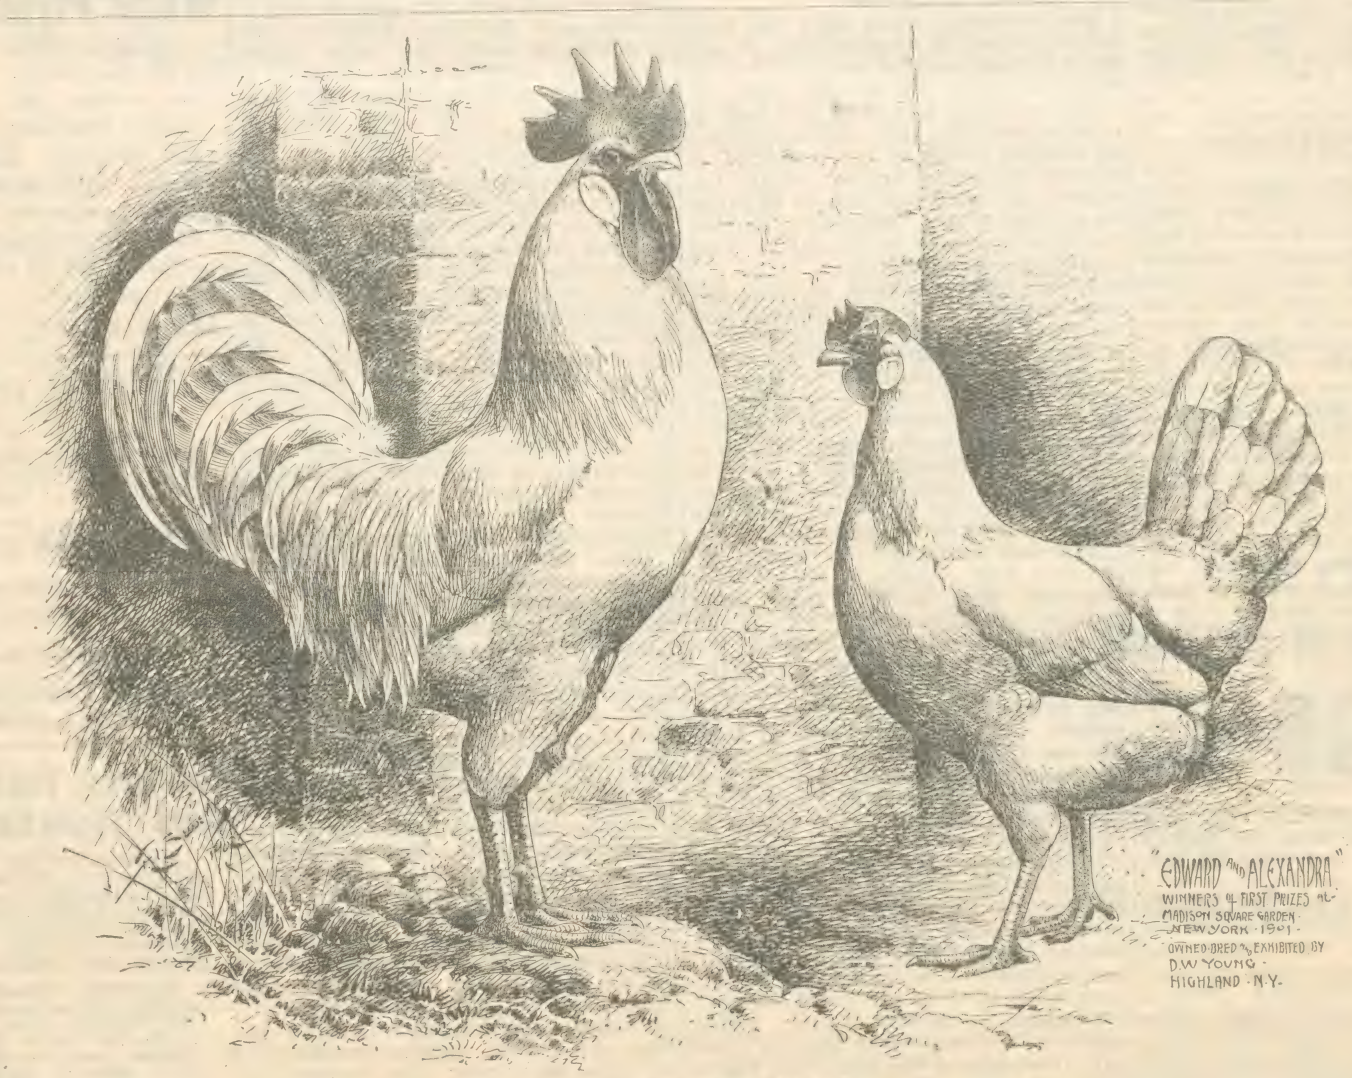
POULTRY MANAGEMENT

As Practiced at the Maine Agricultural Experiment Station.

By G. M. Gowell.



Many years practical experience in raising and keeping poultry and investigations in poultry breeding at this Station have resulted in the accumulation of a considerable fund of information on poultry management. The object of this paper is to outline this experience for the benefit of poultry keepers, and help them discriminate between some of the wrong theories which have underlain much of the common practice of the past, and the better theories, which underlie other and newer methods that are yielding more satisfactory results. It may be that the methods in vogue with us are no better than those practiced by others, but in the following pages the attempt is made to concisely state the practices which are now being successfully employed at this Station.

The difficulties attending artificial poultry keeping lie in the numbers of small animals that make up the business. With most domestic animals the care-taker treats each one individually, and there is far less draft on the abilities of the herdsman with his large animals than on the manager of even a small poultry plant with its far greater numbers of individuals.

Labor is the costliest factor that enters into the management and equipment of a poultry farm. The cost of food required to produce a pound of beef, pork or chicken does not differ greatly, but while the dressed steer and pig sell for from 5 to 8 cents per pound, the chicken sells for from 15 to 20 cents per pound, and early in the season for much more. The differences in their selling prices represent the difference in the risk and skill employed in their production. Furthermore, the increasing demand for choice articles of food will tend to maintain these prices, even though the supply be greatly increased. The products of the poultry farms, the fresh self-sealed eggs, each an unbroken package in itself, and the delicately flavored chickens, are among the choicest articles of food to be found in the markets.

While poultry raising is exacting in its demands, there are no conditions imposed that cannot be compassed by persons of ordinary mental and physical capacity. In this as in other callings, the skill which comes from thorough training and the energy needed for persistent work are essential to the fullest success.

The history of the poultry industry of this country is being rapidly made, these years, on the farms village lots and at the experiment stations, and written in the minds of the thousands of earnest workers who are engaged in it. From this accumulated knowledge is to come, in the near future, a better, general understanding of the subject, which will enable men or women of ordinary abilities to take up the work for themselves, in a small way, and proceed without making many of the mistakes that caused their predecessors to waste money and labor, and lose heart. Poultry and egg production are as legitimate lines of work for persons of small or large means as are dairying, beef growing, sheep husbandry, or general or special crop production. Its advantages lie in its greater returns for its smaller capital investment. Its disadvantages lie in the demand for greater skill, patience and courage than will suffice for any other special, or general farm industry.

RAISING CHICKENS BY NATURAL PROCESSES.

Circumstances sometimes make it necessary to hatch and raise chickens by aid of the mother hen. While we do not like the method, we have practiced it; having at times as many as a hundred sitting hens along the side of a room—in two tiers—one above the other. An unused tieup in a barn was taken for the incubating room and a platform was made along the side next to the barn floor. The platform was 3 feet above the floor and was two and a half feet wide and 50 feet long. It was divided up into 50 little stalls or nests, each one foot wide and 2 feet long, and one foot high. This left a 6 inch walk along in front of the nests, for the hens to light on when flying up from the floor. Each nest had a door made of laths at the front, so as to give ventilation. It was hinged at the bottom and turned outward. Across the center of each nest, a low partition was placed, so that the nesting material would be kept in the back end, the nest proper. For early spring work paper was put in the bottom of the nest, then an inch or two of dry earth, and on that the nest, made of soft hay.

Whenever half a dozen hens became broody they were taken in from the hen house and put on the nests, each nest having a dummy egg in it; the covers were then shut up and nearly every hen seemed contented. In a day or two thirteen eggs were placed under each bird. Every morning the hens were liberated as soon as it was light, when they would come down of their own accord and burrow in the dry dust on the floor, eat, drink, and exercise, and in twelve or fifteen minutes they would nearly all go onto the nests voluntarily. In the afternoons one would occasionally be found off the eggs, looking out through the slatted door. If she persisted in coming off she was exchanged for a better sitter. The double nest is necessary, otherwise the discontented hen would have no room to stand up, except on her nest full of eggs, and she would very likely ruin them. With the double nest there was no danger of this, as she would step off the nest, go to the door, and try to get out. The arrangement was satisfactory and were it not for the lice, which were not easily gotten rid of, since the chicks grew with the mother hen, we would prefer it to some incubators we have used.

The advantages of a closed room in which to confine the sitters are many, as the hens are easily controlled and do not need watching as they do when selecting nests for themselves, or when sitting in the same room with laying hens. A room a dozen feet square could be arranged so as to easily accommodate fifty sitters. Except for the small operator we would not encourage the use of sitting hens.

For the accommodation of the hen with her brood of young chicks, the best arrangement consists of a close coop about 30 inches square, with a hinged roof, and a movable floor in two parts, which can be lifted out each day for cleaning. This little coop has a wire covered yard attached to it on the south side. The yard is 4 by 5 feet in size and a foot and a half high. Its frame is of 1x3 inch strips and is fastened securely to the coop. The wire on the sides is of one inch mest, but on top two inch mesh is sufficient. The coop is easily kept clean and the coop and yard can be set over onto clean grass by one person.

The small run is sufficient for the first few weeks, but soon the chicks need greater range and then the farther end of the run can be lifted up 3 or 4 inches and they can pass in and out at will, while the mother will be secure at home, and the will know where to find her when they get cold or damp, and need brooding. Such a coop accommodates 15 to 20 chicks until they no longer require brooding, after which several flocks are combined in one and put in a portable house on a grassy range.

Whenever the hen is allowed to hatch, or to mother chicks, much care must be experienced or lice will get a foothold and ruin the birds. The free and frequent use of fresh insect powder upon the hen, working is through the feathers to the skin, is one of the best methods for destroying the pests. Grease or oil are effective when applied to the heads and under the wings of young chicks, but care must be taken not to get too much on them, especially during damp weather. The feeding of chicks raised in coops with their mothers does not vary much from those raised in brooders.

RAISING CHICKENS BY ARTIFICIAL PROCESSES.

Incubators have been so much improved that there are several kinds on the market that we feel sure will hatch as many chicks from a given lot of eggs as can be done by selected broody hens. They require little care, maintain an even temperature, and are easily adjusted to meet the increase in temperature arising from developments going on in the eggs. In some machines the moisture supply is automatic and adapted to the requirements. In others it has to be supplied, and skill is necessary in determining the quantity needed. The economy of the incubator is very great. A 360 egg machine will do the work of nearly 30 brooding hens, and can be kept at work continually, if desired. We commenced our work in artificial incubation years ago, by trying to maintain the temperature in a home-made wooden box, with double walls, by the use of jugs of warm water. By locating the box in a suitable room and keeping close watch on conditions, good hatches were obtained. It was the best there was at that time, but the use of home-made incubators now, would be like turning back into the days of the wooden plow.

There are several kinds of good incubators, but the one which we have used with greatest satisfaction is the Cyphers, with its capacity of 360 eggs. We have used others that hatch as well, but the Cyphers requires less care. We have not tested many incubators and other makes that we have not used may be as good.

The incubator room must be kept quite constant in temperature. A cellar is a good place in which to run incubators if it is not so cold as to require the lamps to be run very high in order to maintain the necessary degree of warmth inside of the machine. If several incubators are located in the same room, great care should be taken to provide proper ventilation, so that the machines may be furnished with clean fresh air at all times.

Where many machines are used, the hand turning of the eggs absorbs considerable time. We have used several turning devices and conducted experiments to determine the differences between hand and machine turning, and have not yet received better hatches from the hand turned eggs. Machines that have automatic turning shelves will not hold quite as many eggs as when flat shelves are used, but the saving of time is of importance.

A person should get thoroughly acquainted with a machine before putting the eggs in and then make changes and adjustments with great care, lest the results be extreme. We used to think it necessary to have the chickens hatched in March so that they might be ready for laying by November. By better methods of feeding and treatment we can now delay the hatching until April, and the first half of May, and the pullets get to laying maturity as early in the season as formerly.

We use indoor brooders, mostly, and very much prefer them to any outside brooders we have seen in use. The portable brooder houses are built on runners so that they may be readily moved about. The houses are 12 feet long, some of them are 6 and others 7 feet wide. Seven feet is the better width. They are 6 feet high in front and 4 feet high in the back. The frame is of 2x3 inch stuff; the floor is double boarded. The building is boarded, papered and shingled all over. A door, 2 feet wide, is in the center of the front and a 6 light sliding window is on each side of it. A small slide is put in the door, near the top, by which ventilation may be obtained early in the season, before the windows can be kept open. Since shingles on the walls near the bottom are liable to be torn off in moving the houses, double boarding on the walls would be preferable. Two brooders are placed in each of these houses and 50 to 60 chicks are put with each brooder. A low partition separates the flocks while they are young, but later it has to be made higher. The houses are large enough so that a person can go in and do the work comfortably and each one accommodates 100 chicks until the cockerels are large enough to be removed.

In the fall these houses are grouped together, 20 or 30 feet from each other, so as to make the care of the young chicks convenient in early spring while the brooders are in use.

About the 20th of June the grass is cut on some field near to the main poultry, or farm buildings, and the brooder houses are drawn out, with their contents of chickens, and located 50 to 75 feet from each other, in lines, so that they may be reached with little travel. The chickens are shut into small yards, adjoining the houses, for about a week, after which they are allowed to run together. They mostly keep to their own houses, although they wander away quite long distances during the day, returning at feed time, and at night.

The most satisfactory brooder that we have used is the "Peep O' Day." The style that we like best has the cover and part of one side arranged to turn down, making an inclining run the whole width of the brooder, up and down which the little chicks can go without crowding. Some of the later styles of brooders made by this company are not as satisfactory, as they have little passages, through which the chicks are to pass up and down, and they require more or less teaching before they will use them.

Most kinds of brooders as now made keep the chick comfortable, at desired temperatures, and have good means of ventilation. The great difficulty lies in the lamps used. The lamp apartments are small and the tendency is for the oil to become warm and form gases, which causes the flame to stream up and make trouble. Most brooder lamps have water pans between the oil tank and the burner which tend to keep the oil cool, but even with this precaution we have had two fires,one of which was very serious. The old Peep O' Day lamp was of this kind, but the new ones are entirely different, and by far the best of any we have seen. They have no water pans, but are so arranged that currents of cool air pass constantly over the oil tank and keep its contents cool. We have used these lamps, or stoves, for three years—last year more than twenty of them—and regard them as safe, for the oil has never become warm.

TREATMENT OF YOUNG CHICKS.

When the chicks are 30 to 40 hours old they are carried in warm covered baskets to the brooders, and 50 or 60 are put under each hover, where the temperature is between 95 and 100 degrees. The temperature is now allowed to fall below 95 degrees the first week, or 90 during the second week; then it is greatly reduced according to the temperature outside, care being taken not to drive the chicks out by too much heat, or to cause them to crowd together under the hover because they are cold. They should flatten out separately, when young, and a little later, lie with their heads just at the edge of the fringe of the hover. Under no condition are they allowed to huddle outside of the brooder. They huddle because they are cold, and they should be put under the hover to get warm, until they learn to do so of their own accord. Neither are they allowed to stay under the hover too much, but are forced out into the cooler air where they gain strength in the day time. They are not allowed to get more than a foot away from the hover during the first two days; then a little further away each day, and down onto the house floor about the fourth or fifth day, if the weather is not too cold. They must not get cold enough to huddle or cry, but they must come out from under the hover frequently.

The floor of the brooder is cleaned every day and kept well sprinkled with sharp, fine crushed rock, known in the market as "chicken grit." The floor of the house is covered with clover leaves, or hay chaff, from the feeding floor in the cattle barns. For raising winter chickens the long piped brooder house is indispensable, and it has many advantages when used at any season of the year. The advantages are especially great when raising chickens, if April or May prove to be cold and wet, for then the small houses are apt to be cold outside of the brooders.

The expenditure is greater for the piped house, for the reason that colony houses should be provided in which the chickens may be sheltered after they leave the brooder-house. In ordinary seasons we experience no difficulty in raising April and May hatched chicks in the small houses. With proper feeding, pullets hatched in these months are early enough to do good work throughout the year.

FEEDING THE CHICKS.

For feed for young chicks we make bread by mixing three parts corn meal, one part wheat bran, and one part wheat middlings or flour, with skim milk or water, mixing it very dry, and salting as usual for bread. It is baked thoroughly, and when well done if it is not dry enough so as to crumble, it is broken up and dried out in the oven and then ground in a mortar or mill. The infertile eggs are hard boiled and ground shell and all, in a sausage mill. About one part of ground egg and four parts of bread crumbs are rubbed together until the egg is well divided. This bread makes up about one-half of the food of the chicks until they are five or six weeks old. Eggs are always used with it for the first or one two weeks, and then fine sifted beef scrap is mixed with the bread.

It may be that the bread is not necessary and that something else is just as good. We have tried many other foods, including several of the most highly prepared dry chicken foods, but as yet have found nothing that gives us as good health and growth as the bread fed in connection with dry broken grains.

When the chicks are first brought to the brooders, bread crumbs are sprinkled on the floor of the brooder among the grit, and in this way they learn to eat, taking in grit and food at the same time. After the first day the food is given in tin plates, 4 to each brooder. The plates have low edges, and the chicks go onto them and find the food readily. After they have had the food before them for five minutes the plates are removed. As they have not spilled much of it, they have little left to lunch on except what they scratch for. In the course of a few days light wooden troughs are substituted for the plates. The bottom of the trough is a strip of half inch board, 2 feet long and 3 inches wide. Laths are nailed around the edges. The birds are fed four times a day in these troughs until they outgrow them, as follows: Bread and egg or scrap early in the morning; at half past nine o'clock dry grain, either pin head oats, crushed wheat, millet seed or cracked corn. At one o'clock dry grain again, and the last feed of the day is of the bread with egg or scrap.

Between the four feeds in the pans or troughs, millet seed, pin head oats and fine cracked corn, and later whole wheat, are scattered in the chaff on the floor for the chicks to scratch for. This makes them exercise, and care is taken that they do not find the food too easily.

One condition is made imperative in our feeding. The food is never to remain in the troughs more than 5 minutes before the troughs are cleaned or removed. This insures sharp appetites at meal time, and guards against inactivity which comes from over feeding.

Charcoal, granulated bone, oyster shell and sharp grit are always kept by them, as well as clean water. Mangolds are cut into slices, which they soon learn to peck. When the grass begins to grow they are able to get green food from the yards. If the small yards are worn out before they are moved to the range, green cut clover or rape is fed to them.

After the chickens are moved to the range they are fed in the same manner, except that the morning and evening feed it made of corn meal, middlings and wheat bran, to which one tenth as much beef scrap is added. The other two feeds are of wheat and cracked corn. One year we fed double the amount of scrap all through the growing season and had the April and May pullets well developed and laying through September and October. To our sorrow they nearly all moulted in December, and that month and January were nearly bare of eggs.

FEEDING THE COCKERELS FOR MARKET.

When the chickens are moved to the field the sexes are separated. The pullets are cared for as explained above. The cockerels are confined in yards, in lots of about 100, and fed twice daily on porridge made of 4 parts corn meal, 2 parts middlings or flour, and one part fine beef scrap. The mixed meals are wet with skim milk or water—milk is preferred—until the mixture will just run, but not drop, from the end of a wooden spoon. They are given what they will eat of this in the morning and again towards evening. It is left before them until all have eaten heartily, not more than an hour at one time, after which the troughs are removed and cleaned. The cockerels are given plenty of shade and kept as quiet as possible. We have found our chickens that are about one hundred days old at the beginning to gain in four weeks' feeding from one and three-fourths to two and one-fourth pounds each and sometimes more. Confined and fed in this way they are meaty and soft and in very much better market condition than though they had been fed generously on dry grains and given more liberty. Poultry raisers cannot afford to sell the chickens as they run, but they can profit greatly by fleshing and fattening them as described. Many careful tests in chicken feeding have shown that as great gains are as cheaply and more easily made, when the chickens, in lots not to exceed 100, are put in a house with a floor space of 75 to 100 feet and a yard of corresponding size, as when they are divided into lots of 4 birds each and confined in latticed coops, just large enough to hold them. Four weeks has been about the limit of profitable feeding, both in the large and small lots. Chickens gain faster while young. In every case birds that were one hundred and fifty to one hundred and seventy-five days old have given us comparatively small gains. The practice of successful poultrymen in selling the cockerels at the earliest marketable age is well founded, for the spring chicken, sold at Thanksgiving time is an expensive product.

A very large proportion of the chickens raised in this State are sent to market alive, without being fattened, usually bringing to the growers from twenty-five to thirty-five cents each. The experiments referred to above indicate that they can be retained and fed a few weeks, in inexpensive sheds, or large coops with small runs, and sent to the markets dressed, and make good returns for the labor and care expended. The quality of the well-covered, soft fleshed chickens, if not too fat, is so much superior to the same birds not specially prepared, that they will be sought for at the higher price. The dairy farmer is particularly well prepared to carry on this work as he has the skim milk which is of great importance in obtaining yield and quality of flesh.

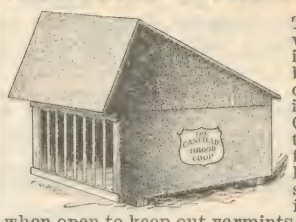
A WARNING FROM THE SOUTH.

Editor American Fancier:



In looking over the editor's notes in April 30th issue, I notice an article on breeders with a big show record selling birds for several times their real work. This article reminds me of the thousands of dollars out southern breeders are sending north and east each season for stock and eggs and getting no better, if as good, as they could get at or near home for less than one-half they are getting them for. They seem to think if a breeder has won prizes at Madison Square Garden or Boston that all stock bred by them is of the best and they pay long prices many times for culls from these breeders' yards. Let me illustrate two cases that came under my own observation: A party ordered a Barred Rock cockerel from a prominent eastern breeder for the Charlotte, N. C., show, held January 12 to 15, 1904, paying $10.00 for him and $2.00 express, making the bird cost $12.00. Of course he did not expect a very fine show bird for this money, but as he could buy as good as any of his neighbors had for $5.00 to $7.50, he expected a better bird than they had, but when the bird was put on exhibition he failed to even win a 5th place, in fact he found his neighbor had birds he could buy for $1.50 to $2.00 that scored higher than his did and just as well and carefully bred. He was not only off as a show bird, but was not fit for a breeder if a man wanted to breed good stock, being small in size and badly off in color. The other case: A neighbor wanted some fine Barred Rocks and thought he could not get as good in this country as he wanted. He sent $10.00 to a prominent eastern breeder for three settings of eggs and raised one chick, very common, but not yet discouraged. He sent the same breeder $10.00 for a breeding pair of birds, of course not expecting to get show birds at $5.00. I was at the express office when these birds came. The cockerel was very common, worth here about $1.00, in fact we sell many better ones at $1.00; the pullet was nothing but a cull, not fit to send out as a breeder at any price, in fact if a beginning was to send out such a bird, even at $1.00, it would ruin his trade. We never think of sending a customer such a bird at any price. She was small, very dark and smutty and as sorry a comb as I ever saw. Of course he did not expect show birds at $5.00, but he did expect a good breeder and should have had it. If breeders up north and east can sell such birds as those at $5.00, we southern breeders had better get them to sell our culls for us. Now, I don't want to be misunderstood, nor I don't mean that all prominent breeders north and east send out such stock as this, as I have bought stock and seen a lot of stock from prominent breeders that was all that could be asked for or expected, but I write this to show that our southern breeders are beginning to know where they are imposed on and to know what a good bird is and to raise as good birds as in any section. I think the editor of the American Fancier will bear me out in this, as birds we sent to the last Hagerstown show were commented on very favorably by him, especially the 1st Partridge Wyandotte cock shown by us. I would like to sound a note of warning to these breeders and tell them if they expect to continue to get our trade they will have to send us stock worth the price paid. North Carolina is expecting to have a fine exhibit at St. Louis in November and they expect also to carry off their portion of blue ribbons.

THE NEW ILLUSTRATED STANDARD.

We call attention to Secretary Orr's announcement on another page of this issue regarding the new illustrated Standard of Perfection to be published by the American Poultry Association this summer or fall.

It has taken two years to complete this work and it has taken thousands of dollars, as well as hundreds of hours, to accomplish it.

The illustrations alone are features never before attempted on a poultry publication of any kind.

America's best talent has worked hard and faithfully to produce these pictures, that should prove of decided advantage to the amateur and of no mean help to the more advanced breeder.

To judges, the book will be a law of itself. The instructions are clear and to the point. They are not the product of the brain of one; on the contrary, they embody the thought and experience of many.

The ideals set up in this magnificent book are high and that's what the framers aimed at. It should elevate the standard of poultry, as well as the standard of breeding and judging.

The book will be larger than the old standard and infinitely handsomer in every detail. Presswork, binding and illustrations call for the best the printers' shop can produce.

The writer has been honored with a place on the Revision, as well as the Publication committee, and speaks from actual experience and observation when referring to the future guide book of the American fancy.

The American Fancier will make arrangements to deliver the new Standard to its readers as fast as they can be secured from the printers. It is well to remember that many thousands of these books will be ordered and all orders will be filed and filled in rotation. We have started a separate book in which to enter and number orders and will be ready to receive the latter immediately after the announcement in our advertising pages, which will appear in a week or two. This gives all of our readers the same chance, and first come will be first served.

We are informed by Messrs. Clayton and Freeman that there will probably be no show held at New Britain, Conn., November 15 to 18, as Mr. Clayton, the promoter of the scheme, has engaged in other business and will not have the time to devote to it.

The pair of prize-winning White Leghorns illustrated on our title page reminds us of the fact that the owner and breeder of the same, Mr. D. W. Young, Highland, N. Y., is a veteran at the business of raising the white beauties, stock from his yards having been disseminated throughout the country many years ago, and his recent winnings at the Madison Square Garden, New York, prove that his strain is as good as ever. It is simon-pure White Leghorn blood.

Another old veteran White Leghorn breeder is Mr. G. A. Geyer, Florin, Pa. For the past fifteen years he has bred in line a strain of birds carefully selected from the once famous Knapp Bros.' birds. The same blood exists in the yards that was the foundation fifteen years ago. The results from the two pens Mr. Geyer breeds each season have averaged high in both male and female progeny, some of his males being exceptionally strong in Leghorn style and head points.

We call attention to the above two veterans simply because they have followed line breeding and kept the blood pure, no outcrossing with Minorca or White Plymouth Rock having been resorted to in the wild endeavor to increase the size of the birds. The few White Leghorn breeders that have tried these outcrosses admit that the results are not of permanent value, especially the infusion of White Rock blood, which destroys the even character and color of the eggs that are the White Leghorn's stock in trade. The White Minorca cross is less objectionable and in some cases has produced excellent results in the rebuilding up of a too finely drawn lot of birds rather small in size. But great care must be exercised in the selection of the female White Minorcas in regard to smallness of comb and gracefulness of carriage, while the male Leghorn selected to mate with the latter should be unusually strong in color of legs, beak and skin.

Selling eggs for hatching is not a bed of roses. Even the best intentions of the most honorable breeder and fancier fail to please disgruntled buyers. Where ignorance alone is the cause for complaint, the "kicker" might be deemed excusable, but where deliberate attempts are made to "work" the seller, patience ceases to be a virtue. A well known and thoroughly honest breeder sent two settings of eggs, one to a party we will call A; another to a party we will call B. The eggs were gathered from the same pens and were about of the same age when shipped. A writes back that he had great luck in getting eleven chicks from the setting. B writes: "Had only one chick from the setting," and in a P. S. to the letter, remarks "My father says you knew the eggs would not hatch when you shipped them." That broke up the seller and he wrote back: "Enclosed find check for three dollars, the amount you sent for one setting of eggs. Tell your father that neither he nor you can ever buy an egg or bird from me in the future." The father was a prominent poultryman and one that is lauded in print, etc. Yet he kept the check and was not man enough to acknowledge its receipt.

Another case that came under our observation. A rather loud-spoken, self-opinionated chicken raiser, who was nicely stuffed with chicken lore gleaned from book reading, made a red hot protest against a well-known fancier of Barred Rocks sometime ago. He sent for two settings of eggs from pullet matings. When the chickens grew up he grew red in the face and came to us and remarked: "That—— is a —— skin. I sent for eggs from a pullet mating and every —— chicken is a cockerel."

The annual catalog of the American Buff Plymouth Rock Club is a very neatly printed and interesting pamphlet issued by a progressive and up-to-date organization of fanciers. A three-cent stamp, enclosed in a letter addressed, W. C. Denny, Sec'y., Rochester, N. Y., will secure a copy.

After two years of hard work, J. D. Jaquins, superintendent of poultry at the New York State Fair, Syracuse, N. Y., has succeeded in getting a bill through the legislature and duly signed by the Governor, allowing an appropriation for the purchase of new, up-to-date coops and benching in the poultry department. This is good news for all poultrymen. A meeting of the committee in charge was held May 18 at the Yates Hotel, Syracuse, N. Y. Further particulars will be given in our next issue.

The two big shows of England, the time-honored Crystal Palace and the newer but powerful International, are going to clash in their dates; in fact, the younger has thrown down the gauntlet to the older champion, and there promises to be "something doing" in the ranks of the fancy on the other side.

To a disinterested observer, especially at a distance of several thousand miles, it seems that a gigantic mistake is being made, and the mistake is chargeable to the younger organization. The right to hold one show or a dozen, if you please, in one city is denied to none; the wisdom of doing this is questionable, especially when the same dates are selected. There is a glamor and we might say, a halo, about the Crystal Palace show that "will not down." Acknowledging the facts that the management is mercenary, selfish and dilatory in its methods, the charm of the name remains. The evils that have crept in through the greed and short-sightedness to some of the officers of the Crystal Palace can far better be eradicated by strenuous measures applied from within than from without. And this holds good with all bodies politic or otherwise.

Even in this country and especially in the great metropolis of the new world, New York, considerable excitement has been caused by the announcement of another New York show. From letters received some think it wrong to hold two shows and much is said pro and con the new venture. We publish the news and the facts regarding both New York shows. That is our business and our duty to the fancy. As to the November function to be held at the Herald Square, we believe it will not interfere with or injure the old, time-honored show at the Madison Square. Greater New York is a wonderful city, with a solid and substantial growth and three million or more of inhabitants. The November exhibition held in a hall that caps one of the greatest department stores in the country will attract thousands of people that probably would not attend the Madison Square Garden, and consequently a large and new field is opened up to the poultry industry, all of which should prove fertile ground. Besides, many of the smaller exhibitors will find an opportunity to show birds and compare their exhibits with those of the more renowned showmen. The Madison Square Garden show, like the Crystal Palace, will remain, however, as the name is a trade-mark in the poultry fancy.

We regret to learn that F. B. Zimmer has been confined to his room by a severe attack of rheumatism for the past three weeks and is still not able to attend the manifold duties that fall to the lot of an extensive breeder of choice Beagle hounds and Bantams. Hot weather is what "Zim" is yearning for, and there are others. Chicken culture is rather beset with adverse climatic condition in this section at present, but Bantams do better later on, and that is one consolation for Frank Beagle Zimmer.

A. E. Blunck has been making some big sales in Games and Bantams of late, and his entire surplus stock is about cleaned up. His manager, John Blunck, has started a lively campaign in the egg hatching line, however, and in a month or two there will be Games and Bantam chickens by the hundreds on the different "reservations" selected for their early growth.

George N. Burgott, the tall and strenuous fancier of Brown Leghorns of Lawtons, N. Y., contemplates spreading out in the chicken business and has a number of finely mated pens scattered around among a select lot of fanciers to care for. Next fall "George" will have a great bunch to select from and there will be a warm time in the show room when snow flies again, for it is said Mr. Burgott will exhibit largely and will be ready to meet all comers.

Dried skim milk is the latest by-product that is claimed to be a cheap and excellent food for chickens. Why not? In the liquid state it is very good food, but rather difficult to procure; in the dry state it should prove practical and valuable.

Some ultra-practical writers sneer at the sociability of poultry shows. If that misguided crew would stop to think what makes up a real successful poultry show, they will find that fanciers have fads the same as other people. Men do not travel several hundred miles to see a few birds they exhibit; they want to meet the "other fellers," so to speak, enjoy good, solid, chicken talk, have a good time and forget all about the $ sign that makes up much of the rest of their existence when struggling along the thorny paths of business competition. It is just such fanciers that pay good prices for fine stock and "they are the people" when it comes to making poultry shows financially successful. Stick a pin in that.

Dr. Williams of Delaware St., Albany, N. Y., stopped at our office while visiting some of his patrons in this section. He is the originator and distributor of Williams Fire Extractor, an ointment that has been wonderfully successful in relieving burns, being extensively used in foundries for this purpose. Horsemen and cattlemen are also firm believers in the value of this preparation. The late John Glasgow was one of the first to discover its value in cases of roup and canker, and since that day many have used this remedy successfully in such chicken diseases. Being perfectly harmless, it is a safe remedy in the hands of the inexperienced.

Theodore Hewes, editor of the Inland Poultry Journal, will make his headquarters at St. Louis, beginning with this week, representing his paper and company at the World's Fair. He will be located at the Model Poultry Farm and ready to receive all chicken cranks. Now that "Big Theo" is there, it might be truthfully said the World's Fair is really open to poultrydom.

The next big Rochester show will be held January 6 to 12, 1905, at Fitzburgh Hall, Rochester, N. Y. George J. Keller is the secretary this trip, "Old Reliable" John Drechsler being custodian of the ducats. It's a fine pair to draw to. King John Tallinger is on the executive board, of course, where he is all silk. We learn, however, that John T. and Herman T. (Thiem) are taking lessons at Prof. R. J. Ruliffson's on "How to crowd midnight into daylight without resorting to noctural bicycle rides toward home, sweet home." Poultry shows in the Flower City are moving pictures twenty-four hours of each day. "Zim" claims the dog shows are even more strenuous at Rochester, and says the entire town is clock-bound during kennel week.

The Smoky City, as usual, winds up the show season. It was so ordered by the "big four," Selden, Hilldorfer, Skiles and Sutch, and approved by President Moore. The Pittsburg Fanciers' Club will take its good, old, Washington's birthday week, and that means another successful show financially and otherwise.

THE HISTORY OF DOMESTIC FOWLS.

Returning to the subject of the early history of poultry, where we left it, we must commence by observing, that in our carliest printed work on English farming, Sir Anthony Fitzherbert's Boke of Husbandry, published in 1532, there occurs no other notice than the following under the title of What warkes a Wyfe shulde do in generall.

"Thou must gyve thy poleyn (pullen, or poultry) meate in the mornyngs, and whan tyme of the yere commeth thou must take hede how thy hennes,duckes, and gees do lay, and to gather up theyr egges,and when they waxe brodye to sette them there as noo beastes, swyne, nor other vermyn hurte them. And thou must knowe that all hole (whole) footed fowles will sytte a moneth, and all cloven footed fowles wyll sytte but three wekes,except a peyhenne, and great fowles as Cranes, Bustardes, and suche other. And when they have broughte forthe thyre byrdes, to see that they be well kepte from the Gleyd, Crowes, Fullymartes, and other vermyne."

We may observe also, judging from the prices that poultry were scarce at that period, for money was then of much greater value than in the present century. Thus we have before us a memorandum, made in 1536, "That it is agreed by Compositions that the Fellowship of the Poulterers shall serve the King's Majesty (Henry VIII.) weth these kinds of poultry stuff following, on the price as here after appeareth."

Passing over Tusser's Five Hundred Points of Husbandry, which barely touch upon the subject of poultry, we come next to Barnaby Googe's translation of Heresbach's Four Bookes of Husbandrie, published in 1578. The text of Heresbach is no more than a compound from the works of Cato,Varro, and Columella, but Googe introduces some additions, one of which we shall separate from the less interesting contents:

"Your Henne houses must bee made in that parte of your house, as lieth in the Winter towarde the risyng of the Sunne, and ioynyng as nere as maie be to some kille, ouen, or chimney, or to the kitchen, so as the smoke maie come amongeste them for smoke is verie holesome for this kinde of foule. And that was (I thinke) the cause that the old people made choise in their quitrentes of smoke Hennes, as of the beste, as it appeareth by old Rentalles. Lette the front of your Henne house stande alwaies towardes the Easte, and to that coaste let the doore open. Let the inner roomes bee well furnished with Loftes and Lathers, and small windowes openyng Eastward, at which your Poultrie maie flee out in the mornyng, and come into the roust at night. Looke that you make them close at night, and let the windowes bee well lettised for feare of Vermine. Let your nestes and lodgynges, both for laiyng and broodyng, bee orderly caste, and against every neste and roustyng place, place steppes and bordes to come up by, making them as rough as maie bee, that the Hennes maie take good hold when thei flee up to them ,and not by their over smoothenesse, bee forced to flutter and hurte their Egges. It shall not bee amisse, if you pargette the house, bothe within and without with Good Plaister, whereby neither weesell nor other hurtfull vermine maie enter in. Boorded floore are not for foule to rouste upon, whiche almoste any kinde of Birdes refuse, because of the hurte that thei receive by their dounge, whiche if it cleave to their feete, breedeth the Goute. And therefore to roust upon, you must make them perches, which Columella would, should be made fower square; but it is better to have them rounde, so that thei be not too smoothe for them to take holde by. Let the perches reache from one side of the wall to the other,so as thei stande from the floore a foote in height, and twoo foote in distaunce one from the other; and thus have you the fashion of your Henne house. The Courte where thei goe, must bee cleane from doung and durtinesse, not hauyng water in it, sauyng in one place, and that must be verie faire and cleane; for if it bee pudled or durtie, it breedeth (as I saied before) the Pippe. To keepe their water cleane, you maie haue faire earthen, or stone vessel, or troughes of wood, couered in the toppe, in the whiche there must be seuerall holes, so bigge, as the head of the foule maie easely enter; for if you should not keepe them thus couered, the poultrie would in their drinkyng defile and poison it with their doung. Their meate muste be given them betimes in the morning for straiyng abroade, and a little before night, and thei maie come the tymelier to their reste. Those that bee in the Coope, must (as Columella saieth) be fedde thrise in the daie; the others must be used to an acquainted voice, that thei maie come at the callyng. The number must be well marked; for thei sone deceive their keeper. Beside, you muste have rounde aboute by the walles, good plentie of duste,wherein thei maie bathe and proine themselves; for as the Swine delighteth to wallowe in dirte, so dooeth this kinde to bathe and tumble in the duste. And thisis (I thinke) almost all that is to be saied of Pullein."

PROGRESS ON THE NEW STANDARD

The Publication Committee, consisting of Messrs. F. L. Kimmey, J. H. Drevenstedt, D. L. Orr, G. M. Curtis and T. E. Orr, held its second session in Buffalo, N. Y., April 29 and 30, the chief object of this meeting being to receive bids for printing our new "Standard of Perfection." Details and specifications had been sent out three weeks previous to some fifteen printing houses, and thirteen of these responded at the time appointed with sealed bids proposing to do the work namely:

1.—Crow Directory Co., New York City.
2.—Newburg Journal Co., Newburg, N. Y.
3.—Geo. E. Howard, Washington, D.C.
4.—Owen Publishing Co., Dansville, N. Y.
5.—Courier Co., Buffalo, N. Y.
6.—Gies & Co., Buffalo, N. Y.
7.—Nitschke Bros., Columbus, Ohio.
8.—Journal Publishing Co., Middletown, Ohio.
9.—Recorder Publishing Co., Chicago, Ill.
10.—Vreedenberg & Co., Rochester, N. Y.
11.—Webb Publishing Co., St. Paul, Minn.
12.—Mitchell & Co., Greenfield, Ind.
13.—"Fancier's Gazette," Indianapolis, Ind.

These thirteen bids were opened in the order named above. A careful comparison of the bids, section by section, showed that four were considerably lower than the others and so close to each other that only a detailed description would decide the matter, namely, Nos. 6, 9, 10 and 13. After spending the day, and a good portion of the night, no conclusion was reached, and it was not until nearly noon of Saturday, after a most searching inquiry had been made into the character of the bids and the facilities possessed by the firms for doing the work, and after a careful examination of the samples submitted, that the committee finally decided to place the contract with Gies & Co., of Buffalo.

One clause of the specifications was that samples of our class of work, that had been done by the bidders ,must be submitted. In this particular Gies & Co. submitted more satisfactory samples than all other bidders combined, and as their bid in some particulars was lower than any other, and as their guaranty to deliver the work as wanted was the most unquestionable, the contract was placed with that firm for 15,000 copies.

We are sure some particulars concerning the book will be of interest:

In size it will be 5¾x8 inches—more than four-fifths larger than the present Standard. This will enable us to have good sized illustration, as there will be only one on a page.

The front cover will be handsomely embossed in an artistic design which includes, as shown in this circular, an illustration of a cock of one of the fancy varieties. The lettering both on the front cover and the "bone" of the book will be in genuine gold leaf. The binding will be in silk Interlacken cloth of dark olive green, the boards with round corners. Altogether its external appearance will be most handsome.

The book will contain close to 300 pages, which will include eighty-eight full page illustrations of single birds, namely, male and female of forty-four of the leading varieties. The glossary will contain not only definitions and explanations of technical terms, but it will also contain about forty illustrations making things clear and plain to all who can see. This feature of the book will certainly be very attractive.

The leading poultry artists of America are represented—Sewell, Burgess, Graham and Schilling—and each has given us the very finest specimens of his skill. The illustrations for the first edition of the new Standard will add more than $5,000.00 to the cost of the book.

It is hard to estimate the cost of the revising of the Standard and preparing it for the printers. It has been going on for three years. Much of it has been a labor of love. The American Poultry Association and the poultry public cannot hope to fully repay the men who have sacrified so much time and labor. For a portion of these, and for some of their actual expenses, payment has been promised, and whenever the condition of the treasury would allow, these expenses have been paid, but much of it remains a charge against the association. The twelve men who worked day and night for two weeks at Buffalo in May, 1903, as the Revision Committee, have not received a dollar for their work. The Publication Committee at their last meeting had to pay their own traveling and hotel expenses. Not a dollar has yet been paid the artists for the illustrations accepted from the. As there is not money in the treasury to pay for publishing the proceedings of the Indianapolis and Rochester meetings, these must be still further delayed.

Every lover of poultry should feel willing to assist in paying these debts by ordering a copy of the book, cash in advance, thus helping to keep our indebtedness from becoming too large. He can also help much by sending in $10 as fee for a life membership in the Association. He will always be proud to say: "I became a life member the year the Illustrated Standard was published."

Here are two clauses of the specifications which have become a part of the contract:

"6. We purpose giving you copy and illustrations for the first 64 pages by June 1, 1904, and shall aim to furnish copy for at least 64 pages each month thereafter.

"7. You are to deliver 2500 copies in 30 days from the time of receiving copy for last form, and 1,000 per week thereafter if required."

The copy for the entire text of the book is now in the hands of the printers. The illustrations for the first 64 pages are in the hands of the engravers. Mr. Sewell was given the contract for a majority of the illustrations, and upon his health, strength and ability to finish the sketches depends almost entirely the rapidity with which the book can be completed. The members of the Publication Committee think that we may have the book ready for distribution in October.

There is already much inquiry as to the price and terms on which the new Standard will be sold, and as it seems very necessary to bring into the treasury money for completing the work the Publication Committee instructed the Secretary-Treasurer to make the following liberal discounts for cash orders received by him on or before June 30, 1904:

For 100 or more copies at $1.00 each, 3 per cent. discount.

For 500 or more copies at $1.00 each, 5 per cent. discount.

For 1000 or more copies at $1.00 each, 10 per cent. discount.

All such orders received by him on or before June 30, 1904, are to be filled pro rata, also all single orders at the retail price of $1.50 per copy postpaid, from the first deliveries of the Standard from the printers.

After June 30 there will be no discount for cash in advance orders, but any individuals or firms who have become creditors of the American Poultry Association by reason of service rendered in the preparation of the new Standard, may receive Standards in payment of their bills at the regular wholesale price of $12 per dozen.

The Secretary-Treasurer is now prepared to supply electrotypes to those who wish to advertise the new Standard and will agree to use these electrotypes for that purpose only, and will further agree not to sell the book alone at less than the retail price of $1.50 per copy. These electrotypes are in two sizes—single column and double column. Those wishing electrotypes will please state which size they prefer, or whether they will use both sizes if sent them—the larger for display advertisements and the smaller for reading notices.

There have been numerous inquiries for a specially handsome flexible-back, leather bound edition of the new Standard—a book for the center table or for the judge's pocket. The Secretary is glad to announce that he can furnish the book just as described above, in olive-green flexible leather, round corners and red edges, at $2 per copy postpaid, or to publishers at .... per dozen by express, to be sold at not less than $2 retail. This edition is not for money making, but to advertise the new Illustrated Standard of Perfection in the hands of people who will show it—and to furnish, at as near cost as possible, a souvenir copy to those who appreciate the highest style of the printer's art, and who think the Standard of Perfection and the Great American Hen fit representatives thereof.

Now, friends, we have been wading through deep waters, somewhat muddy at times, but we have reached the bank, ascended the slope and are approaching of crest of the ridge. Let there be no falling out of line now. There may be a few bush-whackers trying to outflank our movements, but pay no attention to them. Pop-guns and squirt-guns are not dangerous weapons to face. There are no enemies over the ridge—just one big rich harvest field. Let us each supply himself promptly with a copy of the Revised and Illustrated Standard of Perfection and with a Life Membership in the American Poultry Association, if not a life member already, urging every one who loves poultry to do likewise, and we will thus help ourselves to a good slice of that harvest.

"One thousand life members, and fifteen thousand new Standards sold by July 1, 1905, every debt paid, and all honest people happy"—that should be our mark. If one-half of our present members and one-half the publishers of our fifty poultry journals would just make up their minds to that end and for one year would follow the motto—"Push, but don't shove," the record would be more than surpassed.

BY ORDER OF THE PUBLICATION COMMITTEE.

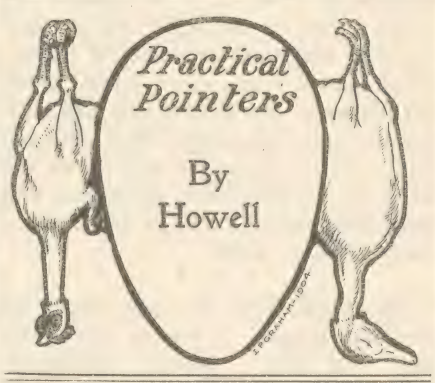
HIGH CLASS



Black Minorcas and White Wyandottes

Our breeding yards not only contain the leading winners at the late New York show, but were selected from yards that have done the bulk of the winning at Madison Square Garden for the past six years. At Rochester we won seven out of a possible ten first prizes.

Eggs for hatching orders will be booked for a very limited number of eggs from yards composed entirely of New York and Rochester winners at $10.00 per 13 straight. All other pens $3.00 per 13; $5.00 for 26.

GEDNEY FARM, WHITE PLAINS, N. Y.

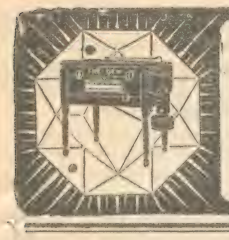
F. W. GAYLOR, Supt. Poultry Department.

Mr. Howell, associate editor of The American Fancier, will furnish weekly reports on the egg and poultry market, and answer all questions submitted to him relating to commercial and practical poultry keeping. When replies are requested to be sent by letter, stamps must be enclosed and letters addressed to George E. Howell, 70 Christopher St., New York City.

Eggs.—Received in this market for the week 133,700 cases, with but little or no change in prices, state white going ½c higher. We quote: State and nearby selected white, 20½c; mixed colors, 19c; western ,18 to 19c; southern, 16 to 17c per dozen.

Poultry.—Receipts, 37 cars live poultry and 7,000 packages dressed; prices going down and market rather slow. Fowls, live 12½c, dressed 12½ to 13c per lb; chickens, live 12½, dressed 16 to 17c, medium grades 14 to 15c; fresh killed Phila broilers, 40 to 50c; other Penna., under 4 lbs. to pair, 30 to 40c; dressed L. I., Jersey, Eastern, Va., and Penna. fancy, 24c per lb; white squabs, $2.50 to $2.75 per dozen.

When I look at some of the illustrations of dressed chickens, scrawny and ill-kept, and invariably note they are labeled "farm fed"—it is to laugh. I am willing to make a bet that more farm flocks are over rather than under condition, and a larger per cent. of scrawny chickens can be found off the farms than on them. Why, unless they were confined, which few farmers do, it would be impossible to starve them to the extent suggested. The utter lack of uniformity and no attempt at improvement by selection is the worst that can be charged against the farmer's hen. No matter how rough and angular their shape, there is generally enough grub lying around to keep them in condition.



Some time since I spoke of a discussion, re how many laying hens could be housed profitably under one roof in one flock. I believe the poultry raisers of this country are gradually perfecting a method of housing and caring for their flocks in a manner that simplifies the labor and reduces the cost of housing to a minimum. I have just read an account in the Tribune Farmer where a flock of 260 Brown Leghorns were housed in a space comprising a little over 600 square feet of floor. In addition to this and evidently a key to the whole situation was a run 22x24 feet covered with litter, where they were kept busy for four hours daily; further, every attention was given them and all their wants supplied down to the minutest detail, owing to which no vices were contracted. My argument is a consolidation of flocks, less money for houses and more attention to the variety and quantity of food given them. Of course it is understood if some of the unpleasant side of poultry keeping crops out, such as feather pulling or an epidemic of roup your large flocks will suffer greater in proportion, but as cited above, these hens were kept incessantly busy and had everything they could possibly crave supplied them.

Mr. Austin G. Brown, manager of the Lakewood Farm Co., (some of whose statements were recently criticized by me) writes: "The printer is responsible, he having left the words per pair from the description at a critical period." We are only too pleased to make this correction. Mr. Brown in his letter easily convinces one of his business ability, and he no doubt has in Lakewood a market that demands the particular style of bird he produces. We thank him in behalf of the American Fancier for the kind invitation extended therein to visit the company's farm. Here is what he says:

"In regard to the heavy weight broilers, I think the 'bull' is on Mr. Type Setter. If he had put 'per pair' behind 'weight 3½ pounds,' the article I could vouch for. We now have Leghorns that weigh one pound at six weeks of age and we have not been forcing them for broilers, and it would be a great pleasure to us to show them to you as well as our farm in general.

"We are strong believers in honest poultry dealings and articles, as the old adage fits the poultry industry to my way of thinking more than most industries, and you will find a large number of people who look on poultrymen in anything but the right light, especially when it comes to doing business through the mails from advertising."

Bill Jones writes me anent the little talk I gave on winners last week, that when it came to the show where all the cracks were to meet some would have to be withdrawn on account of falling off in condition, and not ready to answer the final call for supremacy. Don't see why, when Bill is busy hatching the eggs from his winners, he fills the orders his customers entrust him with from that "just as good pen" he keeps in reserve. If he trusts his honor to them in the hands of his customers, he ought not to hesitate to entrust it in the hands of the judge. What is fair to others ought to be fair to Bill. Truth to tell, I never found the breeding ability improved by excessive showing. One year, after an exceedingly long show season, I mated my Felch high scorers to a long priced winning cock, gave them a veritable Eden to roam in, and got nothing for my time and money; they were so fat the eggs they laid were imperfect and unfertile, and by the time they got in good breeding condition the season

The Gem Incubator has established its intrinsic worth by its wonderful hatching qualities in the hands of hundreds of poultry raisers. had advanced so far my efforts were futile.

A whole season was thrown away, and, like my friend Bill, I had to fall back on the others. This does not mean that showing should be barred by the fancier, nothing of the kind—I said excessive showing. Nearly every locality has its fair in the fall and hen show in the winter, and patriotism alone should rouse every fancier to help each along. Then if the calibre is of the right quality, tackle one of the big gun shows. The social side of the show room is a benefit to any young fancier. He sees for himself and hears others tell what they are doing, by which he profits. There are more friendships formed within the fancy at the shows than from all other sources combined. Such a one we formed back in the eighties and the bond has never been severed since. It has stood the test of time for close to twenty years.

SPECIAL PRIZES

On Buff Plymouth Rocks to Be Awarded at the St. Louis Exposition.

It is with much pleasure that I am able to publish, through the generosity of the members, the following list of specials to be awarded at the St. Louis Exposition.

It is the most valuable one we have ever had, and many thanks are herewith extended the members from all sections of the country for their liberality.

It is to be hoped and expected that every breeder who can possibly do so, will make an entry and so help to assemble the largest and finest display of Buff Rocks that has ever been brought together.

Care has been taken to so place the specials that no one or two birds will get the lion's share, but every one of the seven prize winners in each of the open classes has been provided for, as well as the three best displays.

The specials can be competed for only by club members in good standing on or before October 1, 1904. Breeders who desire to join can obtain application blanks from any officer or member of the club.

New Breeds of Fowls.

The Merits of Anconas and Orpingtons Described

BY G. BRADSHAW.

STRAINS VERSUS BREEDS.

Poultry authorities, unfortunately, when writing on the various breeds of fowls, as a rule give the generally acknowledged characteristics of the breeds, without a thought or consideration whether such qualities exist. Thus fowls, at their origination as a breed, were put before the public with certain characteristics—i. e., good layers or the reverse, of quick or slow growth, of meaty carcases or otherwise. There reputations have been religiously handed down from one writer to another, or, rather, one authority accepted from his predecessor statements as to inherent qualities of the various breeds and embodies them in his work, to be faithfully copied by the next party ambitious of becoming an authority on the attractive and ever fertile subject of fowls, accepting in good faith all that had been previously said; whereas, the various statements could have been readily verified or otherwise by simply keeping a few of the various breeds, or by applying to those who had bred them and thus placed beyond the region of doubt the actual facts concerning the merits of the numerous varieties of fowls which now come under the cognomen of breeds. Had such practical tests been made by any of the several authorities, and the actual results recorded, there is not a doubt but some of the neglected breeds of the present day would be more favorably countenanced; while, on the other hand, one or two sorts that are now bred in moderate quantities would have receded in public favor, as they undoubtedly will when their present patrons become more thoroughly convinced that their reputation as profitable breeds of fowls is an unsound one. That the merits of several breeds which assisted in first bringing them into prominence is still inherent in them is quite true; on the other hand, some breeds have no claim whatever to the wonderful producing properties with which they are so frequently associated, and this is fully borne out by the results of the laying competition carried out at the Hawkesbury College during the present year, from which deductions will be made before the close of these articles. Concerning the persistency with which some characteristic is associated with certain breeds, the same applies to almost every domesticated animal, environment, climatic conditions, reversion, etc., being responsible for the lapse of some qualities and the acquirebent of others. However, taken as a whole, the law of inheritance and transmission in fowls has been as true as with other animals; and when we consider the careless and haphazard way in which domestic poultry are bred and generally cared for, it is remarkable that the original qualities of various breeds have not only been so faithfully preserved but that a considerable advance has been made in egg production and other attributes. However, the subject of useful or other qualities, whether hereditary or acquired, has to be considered apart from breeds; and, although well known to all practical men, the college competition affords a convincing illustration of the tardily accepted truism that laying is not the matter of a breed of fowls so much as of a strain or family of such breed. At the competition referred to there were about forty competing pens of six birds each. Nearly all the breeds were represented, and of some breeds there were several pens, the results of the first six months showing, as stated above, that the name of the breed had little to do in the matter, strain determining the prolificacy or otherwise, as evidenced by the fact that one pen of six Black Orpingtons produced in the six months 548 eggs, or an average of 91 for each hen for the 182 days, while another pen of the same breed, but a contest with but 216 in the same time, all the birds being cared for and tended alike. This breed — Orpingtons—although winning the competition by laying a greater number of eggs than any other of the breeds in the contest, have never been considered as excelling all others in egg production, but are always coupled with Wyandottes as good all-round fowls—profitable to keep for their meat and producing properties; in fact both are briefly termed the utility breeds; hence it was no wonder that a little sensation ensued when it was found that a pen of Black Orpingtons had beaten Leghorns, Minorcas, and Andalusians, and left other reputed layers far behind in the contest. This experience at the College is again confirmatory of what I have always contended, namely, that egg-production is attributable to families or strains of breeds—and breed—rather than to the breeds themselves; hence readers need not run away with the idea that because Black Orpingtons won the six months' college competition that all fowls of that breed are the best layers, but rather that the winning pen and the owner's flock, of which they form part, are a really excellent laying strain of Black Orpingtons; and whether this pen secures the same honorable position in the current six months or otherwise will not detract from the fact that this strain or family produced the greatest number of eggs during the winter six months, when such were of the greatest market value.

A further testimony to this subject of strain is the fact that other pens of this breed and color occupied intermediate, and in one or two cases low positions; and to condemn Orpingtons as bad layers on account of some pens of these making a poor record would just be as erroneous as to assert that the breed were the best layers because one pen headed the list. In the competition, Minorcas, Leghorns, Andalusians, Wyandottes and a number of other breeds competed, all occupying varied positions at the finish, and ranging from 91 eggs each per hen for the prize winners down to as low as 27, a difference of 64 per hen, which, calculated at a 1¼d. each, a low average for the six months commencing with April, makes a difference of 6s. 8d in the actual results from a good and bad laying hen, this difference in the individual members, even of the same breed, determining between the profitableness or otherwise of poultry keeping. As above demonstrated, the commercial results depend on good or bad egg-producers and how a strain to embody this characteristic can be manufactured I will now attempt to show, the following from that well known poultry authority, Lewis Wright, serving as an introduction: "Every desired quality which has become characteristic of a race or strain of animals is the result of repeated and continuous selection, year after year, of breeding stock which possesses that particular quality in more or less perfection. This is equally true, whether we consider some purely 'fancy' point, such as the pencilling of a Hamburg pullet, or some useful quality, such as the laying of over 160 eggs in a year, or the profuse milk yield of a highly-bred Jersey cow. Such a point may sometimes occur occasionaly, or as if by accident, in some individual animal; but if it occurs habitually, as one mark of a strain or family, it has been bred into it by many generations of selection. Some seem to think that such is not the case with wild animals; but in reality it is in their case even more so. Darwin has taught us that the 'natural selection' effected by surroundings, food, struggle for existence, and competition amongst surplus numbers, is most severe; it is unmodified by pity or caprice; and Nature does not vary her methods save in long periods and by imperceptible degrees. She does not select like man, making one choice this year and another the next, but her conditions are the same for generations, and often for ages; hence the wonderful uniformity and permanence of her patterns, as in the plumage of a partridge when uncrossed by any foreign strain. It is in this sense the proverbial phrase of the breeder—'Like produces like'—is true. The breeding which is to succeed in producing valuable animals consists in throwing all the tendencies into one desired direction, so that the influence of remote ancestors, of great-grand parents and grand parents, as well as of the parents, combine towards the desired point. Let us take a case. It would be very easy to find a fowl which, from some cross with the Dorking generations back, and never repeated, exhibited the fifth toe. Though really due to the long back cross, such a fowl may be so rare in that farmyard stock of to-day that we may almost call it an individual variation. However, we have got it. Breeding from such a hen it is probable that a few (and only a few) of her chickens may show the fifth toe, the greater number reverting to the common type. Mating a five-toed cockerel of this produce to a five-toed pullet, the number of five-toed progeny will be increased; but still (supposing, as we have done, with no appreciable Dorking blood in the farmyard) not very many, and the four-toed progeny will still have little tendency to produce five toes. But from these five-toed chickens again select a pair to breed together. We shall now find the tendency much increased; probably half the progeny might be five-toed, and even the four-toed ones would produce more or less five-toed chickens. In the next generation the tendency would be so increased that probably very few four-toed chickens would occur, and in a generation or two more a four-toed bird would be as rare as the five-toed one originally was. We have accumulated into one direction the transmissive tendencies of many successive generations, and we have now a race which we can depend upon with almost absolute certainty to produce birds with five toes." The extract just given is a full explanation of how in a few seasons some outward property hitherto foreign to a variety of fowls can be so permanently engrafted that such property will unerringly appear in the offspring. The nature of this visible property, whether it be shape, comb, color of plumage or other attributes, frequently prompts the experimenter to call the subject of the alteration a new breed; and much less than an extra toe determines the difference between some of our present-day breeds or varieties.

Coming to invisible properties, these are just as subject to the breeder's art, some special quality being as easily bred into a race of fowls as is an outward one, and with the same certainty of transmission to the progeny; and when this inherent quality is the tendency to produce a greater number of eggs in the year than other families of the same breed, then this is what is grawn as a good-laying strain.

POINTS FOR POULTRY AND DUCK KEEPERS.

By J. Harrison.

First, as to fattening. This is a process to be carefully considered, and it is naturally one in which both zeal and ability must be displayed. To prepare chickens for the table they should be well fed from the first. Meat must be put on their bones before fat. Continue to feed until you find that the fowl is no longer increasing in weight.

The following will be found to be the best and most beneficial way of fattening young chickens for the table. Procure a shed as far away from the rest of the poultry as possible, and fitted inside with sliding shutters, for it must be borne in mind that chickens, when under the process of fattening are better kept in the dark, except at feeding time. Then the shutters may be thrown back to let in a supply of fresh air, and to enable the fowls to see to eat their food. Furthermore, they must be kept away from the rest of the Poultry for this reason,—when they are shut up and hear the other fowls outside, they naturally feel inclined to grow restless, and so refuse their food.

Arrange a number of crates, fitted with partitions, each partition big enough to hold four chickens. Each crate should be fitted with bars at the bottom, about an inch apart, so as to allow the droppings to fall through,and should be raised about three feet from the ground. The droppings should be cleaned up twice a week, and a quanti'y of lime, to the depth of about a quarter of an inch spread about on the floor under the crates, so as to keep the fattening shed sweet and clean.

Fix a trough to each crate for the chicken to feed from, a movable one preferred, so that after each meal it may be taken away. Bear in mind that after the young chickens have had enough, the remains must be cleared away, and then they look eagerly forward for the next meal. Always feed them at the same hour every day. This is one of the most important points connected with the methods of fattening.

The proper diet for fattening is: Ground oats, mixed with milk, as this makes the flesh beautifully white, besides giving the chick a delicious flavour. Feed twice a day, in the morning at seven o'clock, and in the afternoon at four. The period of fattening lasts about three weeks, and by this time the chick should be quite ready for the table. If a cramming machine is used, they should be fed for a fortnight, and finished off the third week by the machine. Also old fowls may be fattened up for market in exactly the same way as I have laid down for young chickens.

The best plan to pluck a bird for the table is to do it whilst warm, as the feathers then come out more easily. Always start at the head, and work upwards. Be sure and save all small feathers, as these can be sold at a good price. On no account, "bark" the bird whilst plucking, or otherwise it does not give it such a good appearance when dressed. After you have got all the feathers off, get an old blunt knife and with this abstract all "stubs" from the bird.

This done, press the legs back, open out the feet, and put the bird on a board, fastened to the wall, and slightly raised one side. Press the behind part of the bird tightly to the wall, allowing the head to lay over the side of the board on shelf. If you have several birds to be done at the same time, then place them in rotation, pressed tightly together, so as to keep them in position.

Then place a narrow board on their backs, with a heavy weight on top. Let them stop in this position for at least three hours, and by this time they will be cold and set, and quite ready for the table. I would advise my readers to try and sell their poultry to as many private houses as possible, as they will realize better prices in this way.

There are at the present time many different ways of preserving eggs. I will, therefore, give you two very good recipes for this purpose. One is to smear the shells with glycerine. They need not be packed in any special way, but kept as most convenient. It is, though, best to keep the small end up.

Another way is to procure a good sized earthenware pan. Get a good lump of lime, pour sufficient boiling water over it to dissolve, and let it stand for a day. Then fill the pan with cold water and stir it well. When it is clear enough to see your face in it, it will then be ready for use. Eggs done this way will keep for a year, and come out quite fresh.

Amongst poultry diseases, roup is one of the worst, and above all it is a very catching complaint where any number of fowls are kept. In fact I have been told of two or three cases where a whole poultry yard has been wiped out by this disease alone.

The best plan, then, if any of your fowls have the complaint is to kill them at once, to prevent the risk of infection. If, on the other hand, it is a very valuable bird, then certain measures should be taken to cure it. The symptoms of roup develop in the form of a very bad discharge from the nostrils. It begins like a cold, brought on by cold and wet. separate the birds from the others, and add sulphate of iron and a little sulphuric acid to its drinking water, and wash the bird's head with tepid water.

But be sure and wash your hands well with carbolic soap after you have attended to the bird, before going amongst the other fowls. The diseased bird should be fed on meal, well mixed with boiling water.

If in any case your birds should have the gapes, remove them to a coop and dust them with saltite, a powder specially prepared for this purpose, and sold by any big poultry or game food manufacturers. The powder should be blown into the coop with a pair of bellows, specially made for this purpose. Gapes can be easily detected by the bird "snicking" and trying to abstract the worm from its throat.

I have been often asked how to rear ducks, and I will, therefore, give my readers just a word or two of advice on the subject. Aylesbury ducks are as good as can be reared, and if you feel inclined to have a few ducks you cannot do better than obtain some of this variety. Duck eggs take 28 days to hatch, and are hatched exactly under the same circumstances as those of young chicks. The only difference that the eggs require, whilst under the process of hatching, is, to sprinkle them well every morning, as under natural circumstances a duck, when sitting, always comes back on her eggs direct from the water.

When the young ducks are hatched it is far better to put them in a coop with the hen, enclosed in a pen, on grass. Have the wire about three feet high. The pen should be moved on to fresh ground from time to time. For the first day they do not require any food at all. The first week they should be fed four times a day. Naturally during this period they will not eat much, and what is left must be cleared away.

After this the interval between each meal should be prolonged. The diet for the first ten or twelve days should consist of barley meal and a little coarse oatmeal, and not mixed too dry. Then a little Indian meal may be added to the bill of fare. At six weeks old three meals a day should be sufficient. Up to this period you may give them plenty of pond water or stream water in little pans. Do not, on any account, give them well water, as this is very hard.

To fatten ducks you should shut them up in a dark shed, give them barley meal and Indian meal mixed with boiling water, and only just enough water to wash their food down. Ducks meant for fattening purposes should never be allowed to go to the pond. But ducks kept for laying purposes should be allowed to swim, as it helps to fertilize the eggs.

Always remember that poultry must have great attention, and also must have the best of food, but above all do not over-feed. Give them enough, and no more. If you watch your birds and their habits carefully your own experience will show you in due time the best and sures methods to adopt. In short, poultry bred and reared according to the above directions cannot fail to yield considerable profit to their owner.—Fanciers' Gazette, England.

IT'S A CINCH

to breed the BUFF WYANDOTTE winners if one has the right kind of stock, SUITABLY MATED. It's one thing to secure individuality, but to reproduce or BREED ON, it's absolutely necessary that a specimen's ancestry for A TERM OF YEARS be of the very best of it's time. "Like begets like," OR LIKE ITS ANCESTRY—more often perhaps the latter. What does prove a success from a breeder's standpoint is INDIVIDUALITY BACKED UP WITH A RICH INHERITANCE of first prize winners for many generations. So far, doubtless you agree with me. Now, where better can you find the desired NICKING qualities than from a strain that has been successfully maintained before the public since the origin of the breed?

For FIVE YEARS IN SUCCESSION we have won at New York or Boston THREE OF THE FIRST PRIZES; one year winning ALL THE FIVE FIRSTS AT NEW YORK; another year ALL FIRSTS AT BOSTON, save on pen; each year winning MORE FIRSTS THAN ALL COMPETITORS COMBINED . . . . . .

We have birds for sale that descend straight from these first prize winners. Past years matings were headed by such males as follows: 1-3-5 COCKS, 2 and 3 OPEN CLASS, and 1 and 2 PEN COCKERELS, BOSTON, 1903, also the sires of the four mentioned cockerels, Talk about male producing strains, WHERE IS ITS EQUAL? We don't charge any more for OUR KIND than those claimed to be (?) just as good. Write us for anything you want.

We shall sell eggs at $3.00 per thirteen straight, We are now preparing a circular giving our method of mating which has proven so successful. It is free to those who send for it. Egg orders booked now for future delivery, insuring shipment when wanted. (Send for Catalogue.)

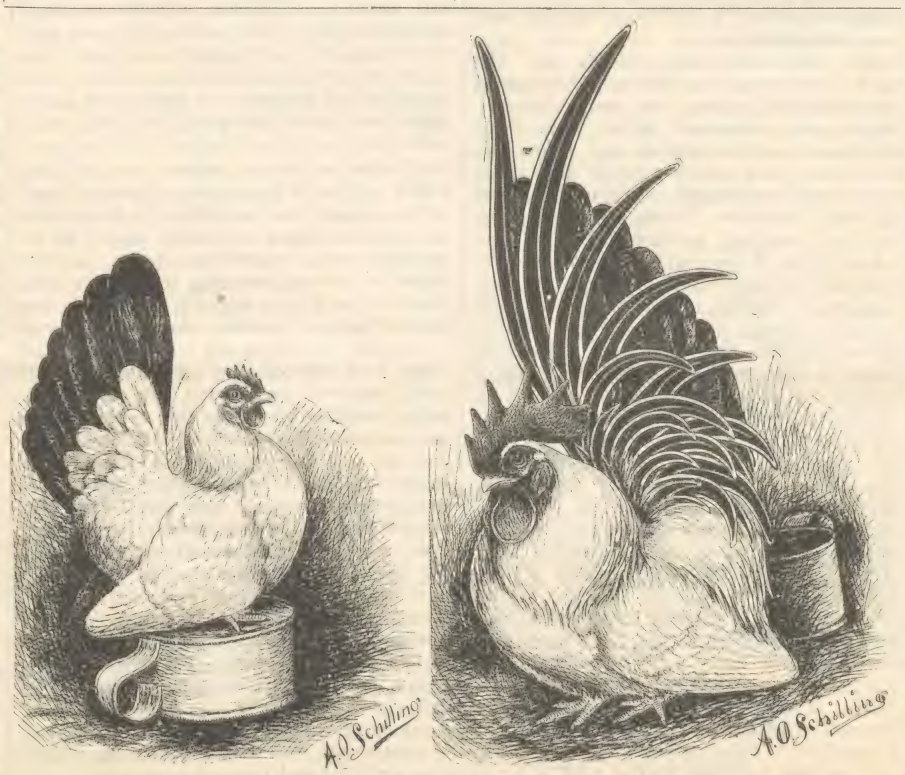
VERMIN.

Parasites and Their Destruction.



By Herbert Twentyman.

It is difficult at times to understand the ways of Nature, and to the poultry fancier parasitic life seems quite unnecessary; yet we are told by some naturalists that if a bird be entirely cleared of parasites for any great length of time it will die. And it is a fact that we find both birds and animals in a wild state infested with their own particular parasites, yet they keep themselves in the best possible condition. With domestication these pests are liable to increase in such numbers that Nature cannot balance herself. Those who hatch and rear fowls artificially claim that chickens so raised are free from parasitic infestation. But I should like to ask, Have you never had a rather backward, weakly chick in your rearer that on examination has proved to be infested with lice?

Insect life is not so easily destroyed as some would have us believe. You may dust your hen with the best "insect powder," and kill every living parasite on her, yet in a few weeks that hen will be brooding louse-infested chickens. We have not far to look for the cause; we have not destroyed their eggs. Nothing stunts the growth of chicks so much as vermin, and the inexperienced poultry-keeper will physic youngsters internally when an outward application is urgently needed. Parasites are seldom, if ever, seen unless we take the trouble to look for them; and the wideawake poultryman will always give an exhaustive outward examination before attempting to diagnose the case of debility, "going light or backward growth."

I am inclined to think that certain seasons produce more parasites than others, and my own experience is that a wet season, especially on a heavy clay soil, is particularly suitable to the multiplication of parasites. Like many other birds, the domestic hen is a dust bather, and if robbed of its natural bath the vermin on it are bound to accumulate. It is a curious thing that parasites seem to thrive best on an unhealthy host; but may it not have been that this unhealthy bird was in its younger days overburdened with pests which robbed it of its health?

In the spring and hot summer months lice are a constant source of annoyance to young stock, and on old birds they are often found in considerable quantities round the vent. Some say a too heating and uniform diet is responsible for this state of things. There may be something in such a theory, but we find in a uniform-fed flock that all the birds are not similarly affected. Certainly a heating food, such as barleymeal, is apt to cause a dryness of the skin, and on such these insects seem to breed and thrive better. Damp and dirty runs are also said to cause the trouble. Granted such runs are not conducive to health, yet I have had chickens which, on leaving their coops, have been liberally dusted with "insect powder," to become infested, although perching in trees in the pure air. This has always happened in wet seasons.

BLACKTAILED JAPANESE BANTAMS.

Lice are known to scientists, at least bird lice, by the name of Mallaphaga. They have piercing mouths which they use for biting, and are not bloodsuckers like the flea and the mite. They live principally on the skin and lower part of the feather, and when they exist in large numbers on a bird it cannot thrive, while in a youngster growth is retarded. Old birds seem to stand their attacks without much outward show of discomfort, but birds so infested can generally be picked out in a flock, as they are constantly pecking at their hidden foes under their wings and round their rump. Lice breed and lay their eggs on their host, and the nits can often be seen on the down which surrounds the vent. They hatch in seven or eight days, and like most creatures they are born hungry, and commence to feed the moment they come into existence. Though lice, as a rule, copulate and live entirely on the bird, there are said to be certain species (which number eight in all) which breed anywhere in quarters inhabited by poultry.

The hen louse, if allowed, will live for many months; but as we are not interested in how long it will live, but rather how quickly its life can be cut short, we look for a suitable manner of destruction. Certainly it does not like insect powder, but it requires many applications before we can effect a cure on a badly infested bird. Mercurial ointment acts well, but its application is not easy, as it must be got to the base of the feather. Corrosive sublimate dusted well down in the fluff is speedy death to insect life, but it should never be applies either in the fowlhouse or run, as it is a very quick and active poison. Creosote is noxious to all insect life, and by mixing one part of it with ten of lard we have an excellent and very effective louse destroyer. Sulphur and alum so often recommended I do not believe in, as neither will keep nest or hen free from vermin. If I find a bird badly infested with vermin in the winter months I place it in a lined poultry basket, the bedding of which is wood shavings springled either with paraffin or benzine. This generally has the desired effect.

Although poultry are subject to the attacks of eight different kinds of lice, I think they are only worried by one species of flea. The female flea deposits its eggs in the nest boxes or any crack or crevice in the roost; and breeding all the year round, and laying a tremendous number of eggs, its progeny multiplies with alarming rapidity. Everybody who keeps fowls is acquainted with the hen flea—a long, dark, nimble creature, which occasionally attaches itself to our person, but it does not stay long, as our blood is evidently distasteful to it. The flea is blessed with a mouth or great strength, as it first punctures the skin before it obtains its meal of blood. As a rule, it is not found on the birds during the daytime, but lives in the roosts, in cracks in the boards or walls, or at the ends of the roosts, and issues forth at night to worry and harass the fowls. It will be seen from this that a dust bath is useless to combat these pests. To exterminate the flea we must devote our attention to its sleeping quarters. When it is only possible to overhaul our poultry houses once a year, September is perhaps the best month for the job. In May most of the breeding pens are broken up, and although it is a busy month for the poultry-keeper, he might find a spare half hour now and then to thoroughly overhaul these houses which are intended for young and growing stock. A good wash can be made of lime, soft soap, and water, with a little creosote or carbolic acid added, and a few ounces of powdered alum and size. The latter gives a better body to the mixture, and helps it to adhere and remain on woodwork. An occasional spraying of a diluted solution of liquor carbo detergens (a preparation of coal tar) will tend to keep the places sweet and free from vermin. If it can be applied under high pressure for a hose so much the better.

There is a small parasitic mite which is often found on the heads of fowls, more especially on the crested varieties, whose presence can be detected by turning aside the crest feathers and down on the top of the skull; hundreds of these insects can be seen running about at the base of the feathers. This mite is responsible for more feather plucking than is generally asserted. For Houdans I have tried with success Calvert's carbolic powder, which is best applied when the birds are at roost and quiet. A few drops of oil of cloves on a piece of cotton wool placed in the centre of the crest will also prove effective. The creosote ointment recommended above kills them very quickly, and if the crest is well parted it can easily be applied to the base of the feathers without disfiguring the crest in any way. Because a crested fowl keeps his or her crest in nice condition it is no guarantee that the bird is not infected with vermin; but usually a bird so affected shows discoloration in the white feathers of the crest, and if the base of the feathers be examined they will be found in a dirty condition covered with the excrement of the mites. Where crested fowls are kept it is advisable to look them over thoroughly at least once a month.

With eight varieties of lice and accumulating fleas one would consider the poor old hen to have quite a lively time of it, but even these do not embrace all her troubles. Mites make up for their lack of size by bloodthirstiness and quantity; they are very minute creatures, but quite discernible to the naked eye. Like the flea they feed on the birds only at night, hiding in the straw and the smallest cracks during the daytime. When filled with blood they are a bright red color, but if we discover them in a roost that has been vacated for some months we shall find them still alive, but that their long fast has turned them a pale straw color. Like the flea they breed at an alarming rate, and on one occasion I found a magnificent hatch of young mites that must have numbered several hundreds, behind a nest box in one of my canary cages. Insect powder did not seem to destroy them very quickly, and I was surprised to find that paraffin dropped an inch from them did not cause death, yet turpentine placed at a similar distance affected them instantly. A solution of quassia is often recommended by canary fanciers for killing these pests, but I invariably use fir tree oil, which I find an excellent preparation for keeping these bloodthirsty little creatures in check. Solutions of carbolic acid or creosote are by far the best to use in the hen roost, which can be sprayed with a garden syringe.

At this time of the year chicks could be examined for vermin, and it is not a bad plan to give them a good dressing of the following ointment, rubbing it well into the down. It should be done when the chicks are about a month old. Take two teaspoonfuls of sulphur and 4oz of lard and mix well with a knife on a plate; then add a few drops of carbolic acid, creosote, or oil of cloves—just sufficient to make it smell rather strongly. This ointment I have found an excellent cure for scaly leg, it takes very little trouble to prepare, and is cheap. Carbolic oil is also a grand dressing for young chicks; it is easily made by mixing a drachm of carbolic acid with a pint of olive or linseed oil. As the strength of carbolic acid varies a good deal one must be guided by one's nose in making a preparation of it. Paraffin is often used for this purpose, but I find it has a bad effect on the chickens' sight.—Poultry, England.

THE HISTORY OF DOMESTIC FOWLS.

We come next to the period when Gervase Markham lived the first really original writer on the subject, whose works were published in this country. The following is extracted from the sixth edition, published in 1631, of his volume, entitled Good and cheap Husbandry for the well-ordering of all Beasts and Fowls.

"Some small thing hath been written of this nature before, but so drawne from the opinions of old writers,as Italians, French, Duch, and such like, that it hath no coherence or congruity with the practice and experience of English customes, both their rules and climes being so different from ours, that except we were to live in their countries, rules which are printed are uselesse, and to no purpose. To let passe the opinion of strangers, and come to our owne home-bred knowledge, which is so mix'd with all profitable experiments, that it needeth not the helpe of other nations so much as men would make us believe.

"You shall understand that the dunghill cock (for the fighting-cocke deserveth a much larger and particular discourse) is a fowle of all other birds the most manliest, stately, and majesticall, very tame and familiar with the man, and naturally inclined to live and prosper in habitable houses; he is hot and strong in the act of generation, and will serve ten hens sufficiently, and some twelve and thirteen. He delighteth in open and liberall plaines, where he might lead forth his hens into greene pastures, and under hedges, where they may warme and bathe themselves in the sunne, for to be penn'd up in walled places, or in paved courts is most unnaturall unto them, neither will they prosper therein.

"Of the Choice and Shape of the Cocke.—Now of the choice and shape of the dung-hill cocke, hee would be of a large and well-sized body, long from the head to the rumpe, and thicke in the girth; his necke would be long, loose, and curiously bending it, and his body together, being streight, and high up erected, as the Falcon, and other birds of prey are; his combe,wattles, and throat would be large, great in compasse, jagged, and very scarlet-red; his eyes round and great, the colour answering the colour of his plume or male, as gray with gray, red with red,or yellow with yellow; his bill would be crooked, sharpe, and strongly set on his head, the colour being suitable with the colour of the feathers on his head; his maine of neck-feathers would be very long, bright, and shining, covering from his head to his shoulders; his legs streight, and of a strong beame, with large, long spurres, sharpe, and a little bending, and the color blacke, yellow or blewish, his clawes short, strong and well wrinckled; his taile long, and covering his body very closely; and for the generall colour of the dung-hill cocke, it would be red, for that is medicinall, and oft used in cullisses and restoratives. This cocke should be valiant within his own walke, and if he be a little knavish, he is so much the better; he would be oft crowing, and busie in scratching the earth to find out wormes and other food for his hens.

"Of the Hen, her Choice and Shape.—Now for then hen, if she be a good one, shee should not differ much from the nature of the cocke, but he be valiant, vigilant, and laborious both for her selfe and her chickens. In shape, the biggest and largest are the best, every proportion answering these before described of the cocke, only instead of her combe, shee should have upon her crowne a high thicke tuft of feathers; to have many and strong claws is good, but to want hinder claws is better, for they oft break the eggs, and such hens sometimes prove unnaturall; it is not good to chuse a crowing hen, for they are neither good breeders, nor good laiers. If you chuse Hens to sit, chuse the elder, for they be constant, and will sit out their times, and if you will chuse hens to lay, chuse the youngest, for they are lusty and prone to the act of ingendring, but for neither purpose chuse a fat hen, for if you set her, she will forsake her nest, and if you keepe her to lay, she will lay her eggs without shells. Besides, a fat hen will waxe slothfull, and neither delight in the one nor in the other act of nature, such hens then are ever fitter for the dish than the hen-house.

"Of Setting Hens."—The best time to set hens, to have the best, largest, and most kindly chickens, is in February,in the increase of the moone, so that she may hatch or disclose her chickens in the increase of the next new moone, being in March, for one brood of March chickens is worth three broods of any other; you may set hens from March till October, and have good chickens, but not after by any meanes, for the winter is a great enemy to their breeding. A hen doth sit twenty-one daies just, and then hatcheth, but peahens, turkies, geese, ducks, and other waterfowle sit thirty; so that if you set your hen, as you may doe upon any of their eggs, you must set her upon them nine daies before you set her upon her owne. A hen will cover nineteene eggs well, and that is the most in true rule, she should cover, but upon what number soever you set her, let it be odde, for so the eggs will lie round, close, and in even proportion together. It is good when you lay your eggs first under your hens, to marke the upper side of them, and then to watch the hen, to see if she busie her selfe to turne them from the one side to the other, which if you find she doth not, then when she riseth from her eggs, to feed or bothe her selfe, you must supply that office, and turne every egg your selfe, and esteeme your hen of so much the lesse reckoning for the use of breeding; be sure that the eggs which you lay under her, be new and sound, which you may know by their heavinesse, fulnesse,and cleereness, if you hold them up betwixt the sun and your eyesight; you must by no meanes, at any time raise your hen from her nest, for that will make her utterly forsake it.

"Choice of Eggs.—Now, for helping a hen to hatch her eggs, or doing that which should be her office, it is unnecessary, and shall be much better to be forborne than any way used; or to make doubt of bringing forth, or to thinke the henne sitteth too long (as many foolish curious housewives doe) if you be sure you set her upon sound eggs, is frivolous, but if you set her upon unsound eggs, then blame yourselfe, both of the loss and injury done to the hen in her lose of labour. A hen will be a good sitter from the second yeere of her laying to the fifth, but hardly any longer; you shall observe, ever when your hen riseth from her nest, to have meate and water ready for her, lest straying too farre to seeke her food, she let her eggs coole too much, which is very hurtfull. In her absence you shall stirre up the straw of her nest, and make it soft and handsome, and lay the eggs in order, as she left them: doe not in the election of your eggs choose those which are monstrous great, for they many times have two yolkes, and though some write,that such eggs will bring out two chickens, yet they are deceived, for if they bring forth two they are commonly most abortive and monstrous. To perfume the neast with brimstone is good, but with rosemary is much better. To set hens in the winter time in stoves or ovens, is of no use with us in England, and though they may by that means bring forth, yet will the chickens be never good nor profitable, but like the planting of lemon and pome granate trees, the fruit will come a great deal short of the charges. When your hen at any time is absent from her neast, you must have great care to see that the cocke come not to sit upon the eggs(as he will offer to do), for he will endanger to breake them, and make her love her neast worse.

"Of Chickens.—As soon as your chickens be hatch'd, if any be weaker than other, yo shall lap them in wooll and let them have the aire of the fire, and it will strengthen them; to perfume them with a little rosemary, is very wholsome also; and thus you may in a sive keepe the first hatcht chickens, till the rest be disclosed (for chickens would have no meate for two daies), and some shells being harder than other, they will take so much distance of time of opening; yet unlesse the chickens be weake, or the hen rude, it is not amisse to let them alone under her, for shee will nourish them most kindly; after two daies is past, the first meate you give them should be very small oatmeale,some dry,and some steep'd in milke, or else fine wheat-bread crums, and after they have got strength, then curds, cheese-parings, white-bread crusts soak'd in milke to drinke; barley-meale or wheat-bread scaided,or any such-like soft meate that is small, and will easily be divided. It is good to keepe chickes one fortnight in the house, and after to suffer them to goe abroad with the hen to worme, for that is very wholesome; to chop greene chives amongst your chickens meate will preserve them from the rie, and other diseases in the head; neither must you at any time let your chickens want water, for if they be forc'd to drink in puddles, it will breed the pip; also, to feed upon tares, darnell, or cockle, is very dangerous for young chickens."—Poultry, England.

COMMON-SENSE PHEASANT REARING.

On every estate where there are keepers kept a few pheasants should be reared annually, and as the men at this time of the year are not otherwise busily engaged, the cost for labor is practically nil.

Then, too, the early eggs from wild birds are gathered, and in many cases, especially where the spring is late and vegetation somewhat scanty, the gathering of these eggs not only ensures a supply for home rearing, but actually is a benefit in preserving the stock of wild birds.

Rooks are most destructive, and if the first eggs are allowed to remain they frequently destroy most of the nests, and the result is that the birds sit later on a smaller second clutch.

The actual cost of hand-reared birds and the percentage from eggs that ought to be turned into the coverts and eventually brought to the gun cannot be definitely stated, as so many extraneous circumstances have to be considered, and these, too, vary in different districts. For instance, a man on an estate where foxes are strictly preserved will never be able to account for such a good percentage as the man who has not to consider the hunt. Then, too, the soil varies and makes a considerable difference in the rearing. To take a typical instance of the average percentage, it may be mentioned that on one large estate one man had, out of 1,100 eggs, 900 poults hatched by May 26, and of these over 850 were turned into the coverts. When the shooting took place 553 birds were killed the first time, and 338 the second,when hens were spared, Of course there was a fair stock of wild birds left over from the preceding season, but against this must be mentioned the fact that the coverts were near the boundary. The actual cost of rearing, including all food purchased, even the barley takings, and also including the food of three dogs,was £46 15s. 4d. Of course, nothing was charged for rabbits, many of which were killed and chopped up, nor for labor, nor for hens' eggs for feeding, nor for the broody hens, which, however, made nearly as much as they cost.

The system adopted was to place the coops fairly wide apart on sloping ground facing south, the whole enclosure being wired round, and three dogs kenneled in the ground and allowed a long run by means of a fixed wire, on which one end of the chain ran freely. This gave the dogs plenty of exercise and prevented intruders from disturbing the place.

Each hen was allowed to hatch her own birds, which were not disturbed until the chicks were ready to put out into the field.

As the subsoil was dry no bottoms were used with the coops, but every night they were covered up with old sacks, straw, and spruce fir boughs to keep them as warm as possible. This is one of the chief points to be observed in pheasant rearing. If the soil is of a damp or clayey nature, then the coops should be provided with movable bottoms, or cramp is likely to be the result.

As before stated, each hen was allowed to have her own chicks, but if the number she hatched was less than fifteen then they were made up to this number. In fine weather chicks will almost rear themselves provided the coops are moved frequently, as the insect food they obtain is really their natural food.

The first day the chicks were hatched they got no food, but were kept nice and warm; the second day they got boiled egg finely chopped, mixed with a little pea and British meal, and as the weather was cold, pepper was freely added, and the whole mixed well together so as to crumble in the hand. In wet weather the food may be softer. As much food and no more should be given as the chicks can eat, and it is far better to keep them a trifle hungry rather than to surfeit them by overfeeding. For the first three weeks chicks were fed at 6, 9 and 12 a. m., and at 3 and 6 p. m. When the weather was not too cold the coops were opened out early even in wet weather, and of course no water was given, as this is not necessary unless the weather be very hot and dry.

In very cold weather the coops should not be opened until about 8 a. m., and extra warmth should be provided at night by means of more straw or other covering for the coops. If the chicks are kept a trifle hungry during the day, at night a slightly larger feed may be given, and they will then fill themselves.

In preparing the food an open copper was used, and it was the custom to boil fresh eggs for twenty minutes, and then chop them up or put them through the mincer, shells and all. Then the eggs were sprinkled with pepper from an old-fashioned box, and equal quantities of pea meal and British meal added, with merely sufficient cold water to damp the mixture.

For the first few days the chicks were fed within the reach of the hen, so that she could pick up any food that was left. The hens were, of course, fed at the same time on Indian and pea meal mixed up into little balls, which they pull to pieces, and which the chicks will also peck at, and even at times leave their own food to join the hen. A little grit or sand is always necessary, and should be sprinkled about the coop unless the soil is very sandy, when it need not be given, as the chicks will find it for themselves.

Coops must be moved at least twice a day, and oftener if possible, as by moving the coops birds get a fresh supply of their natural food.

The droppings should be watched, and any tendency to looseness of the bowels at once checked by mixing a little more pea meal in the food, but this must be carefully watched, as pea meal is of a binding nature.

As the chicks grow the amount of food must be increased, and after the first fortnight small quantities of either greaves, granulated meat, or boiled rabbits chopped fine may be added. Pepper is constantly used when mixing the food, but on no account should food left over from the previous mixing be used, or disaster will ensue, one of the worst foes to successful rearing being stale food. After the birds are a fortnight old eggs are not required, and may gradually be discontinued, they need not be fed so frequently, and when birds are six or seven weeks old barley-meal may be used. As a change of food occasionally, biscuit meal, with a little greaves, appears to be acceptable, and by the time the birds are a couple of months old split peas, wheat, and maize form a portion of their food twice a day.

A palliative of gapes, which often proves so deadly to young birds, is found in a small quantity of turpentine sprinkled over the soft food given at night, and a very little bicarbonate of potash may also be given at the night feed twice a week with advantage, whilst a slight sprinkling of quicklime in the coops and a changing of the coops regularly on to fresh ground should be adopted.

One most important point to secure success is regular feeding and warmth, together with the moving of the coops, and by never overfeeding; in fact, keeping the birds slightly hungry, and thereby inducing them to search for their natural food, is the best preventive of disease. Of course, owing to the nature of the soil, the quantity of food must be increased or diminished, but here individual judgment comes in. When rice is used for feeding in connection with greaves, it should be boiled together in a clean boiler, the greaves being ready ground and put in first, then add rice, and cover all with a lid or something to keep the water from disturbing the greaves at the bottom. The water ought to be two inches above the lever of the meal, and then allowed to boil over a slow fire until all the water disappears, werely running a stick through it occasionally, and when it cools it can be taken out and dried by simply adding British or pea meal, when it makes an ideal food with but little trouble.

Naturally in cold, frosty weather, such as we get occasionally in May, more artificial food should be given, owing to the absence of insect life.

Where foxes are preserved the birds must be kept in the rearing field until big enough to roost in the trees, or the foxes will certainly take heavy toll of them, but if foxes are not preserved then they can be early taken into the rides; but even then there is a danger of vermin; rats especially are most destructive brutes, and must be kept down.

Although by the time the birds are a month old or so the keeper may congratulate himself on their safety, it must be remembered that birds are really never safe from liability to disease until they have got their second tails, when there is not so much prospect of anything going wrong with them. In a good season, when the weather is warm and dry, the percentage of losses is very small—so small, in fact, as to be hardly appreciable—whilst on tainted ground the constant deaths are heart-breaking to the conscientious keeper.

As to rearing by contract, there is a great deal to be said in its favor on both sides. To the clever and painstaking keeper it means a bit of extra money, whilst at the same time giving him an inducement to devote all his energies to success. I know that a good man should not need this incentive, but keepers are but human, and it is a pleasure to know that one is rewarding a good servant indirectly by letting him rear on contract on fairly liberal terms, and any man who gets 1s. 6d. a head for each bird put into the coverts is well paid in an average season for his extra labor, whilst more than recouped for all his outlay on artificial foods and condiments.—Paix. SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1904.

Japanese are among the oldest varieties of Bantams and certainly the most unique, differing in shape characteristics from all breeds, the legs being abnormally short, the bodies just clearing the ground, the wings long and carried below the body line so that they touch the ground, the tail being carried erect, almost touching the head. The latter is embellished with a large comb and eye, giving the bird a grotesque and true dwarfish appearance. The genius of the wonderful Japanese people in producing rare birds is discernable in this strange and wonderfully attractive race of Bantam fowl.

The White Japanese variety is perhaps the most typical, and has been bred to the highest state of perfection. The development of tail and wings with unusual shortness of shank and consequently low set bodies being remarkable. Most of the choicest specimens came direct from Japan to this country, a gentleman by the name of Peters, at Newburgh, N. Y., receiving importations about once in three years.

The Black Tailed variety is the most popular, and when well bred is handsome, the contrast of black and white in the tail markings of the males being very effective and striking, the intensity of the black and regularity of the white lacing and shafting being the coveted points fanciers are desirous of securing.

The Black variety is another fine type of the Japanese Bantam and is now improving greatly in color. The chief defect in male specimens in the past has been the red and brassy feathers in neck and saddle. This has been bred out to a great extent and several recent importations brought out sound colored birds, both made and female, both being fine in style and shape.

Among the newer varieties are the Grey, Buff and Black Red Japanese, all interesting and promising, and destined to become popular when better known. Japanese Bantams are not difficult to breed or rear, as they breed true to feather and shape, and will stand as much hardship as most other Bantams. Wet ground is the principal thing to be guarded against in rearing Japanese Bantams. June is a very good time to set eggs of these varieties in the more northern section; further south, August is the best month to hatch out the winners for the late winter shows.

The Viroqua Poultry Association was organized April 28, at Viroqua, Wis., with the veteran fancier, F. N. Graves, as president. It starts off with about twenty-five members and most rosy prospects for the future. In Mr. Graves it has a worthy and able leader, a genuine fancier and a hustler. Readers of The American Fancier have often enjoyed the Game articles by Mr. Graves and there are more of the same kind in store for them. The president has evidently surrounded himself with a genuine lot of fancier officers, and the motto of the club, "Pure Blood for Profit," is a mighty good one.

The first premium list of the show season of 1904-'05 is at hand. The Western New York Poultry Association issues it, and the inducements held out to exhibitors at its show, June 14 to 18, are such that the latter should respond most liberally and help the initial show along.

The contract for equipping the poultry building at the State Fair grounds, Syracuse, New York, with new coops, was awarded to the Empire Cooping Company of Fultonville, N. Y. This is probably the largest and most important order of this character ever given. It means that the Empire State will have at its annual fall show, a building equipped for exhibiting poultry, pigeons and pet stock unequalled on the globe. It has taken many years to bring about this grand result and now that the new home of the feathered tribe is assured, it is in order for exhibitors in this as well as in other states to send the best they have and fill the handsome building with an array of choice birds such as never has been cooped at any fall exhibition. Supt. Jaquins will attend to the entries, no matter how large, and his work will be done and executed in the able manner that has characterized his past administrations.

Our associate editor, Howell, spins quite a yarn about Turkeys that were fed on intoxicating grain and what happened to the "Turks." "Georgy" then winds up by remarking, "Next!"

Perhaps the following yarn sent to us by a subscriber in Hanover, Pa., and which appeared in the local paper of that place, may or may not startle our Gotham dispenser of hen tales: It seems that there lives a Toulouse Goose among the green hills of the Keystone State that weighs 144 pounds (avoirdupois—not Troy). Being so heavy caused much suffering to the pedal extremities of the aforesaid goose, developing corns, bunions and soreness. This necessitated the use of specially made rubber boots for the feet and legs, to enable "goosey-goosey-gander on the slippery ice to wander." The eggs of this goose are as large as cocoanuts, and the owner claims that one egg is enough for seven custard pies. This wonderful beast will be exhibited at the World's Fair and defy all comers in the goose alley. Next!

We are in receipt of the following letter:

Editor American Fancier:

Dear Sir—What a substantial subscription list the Buff Plymouth Rock Club presented in your issue of the 21st inst. This is certainly a noble gift to inspire club members to exhibit at St. Louis. I hope, however, that the poultry department will accept the club's specials. In the case of the American Orpington Club the special prizes given by its president were refused, consequently all prizes which the club had offered were withdrawn.

Your most truly,
DR. PAUL KYLE,
Kyle Institute,
President of the American Orpington Club.

The above illustrates the sad side of the fancier's life as viewed by the fancier. To be refused his liberal offerings is another sad blow to what he terms the true spirit of the occasion. It makes us all feel sad to think that the soulless crowd that run the Live Stock Department at St. Louis fail to appreciate the really earnest work of fanciers, breeders and exhibitors to help swell the entries at the World's Fair. But why worry over the matter? From the beginning of the whole World's Fair poultry show, the magnificent inefficiency of the powers in charge have been glaringly exposed in the lime-light of just and sound criticism. The insane idea at first suggested that all exhibitors dump their exhibits on the fair grounds, hire coops, take care of, or hire care-takers of their birds, was a very fine illustration of what the management did not know about conducting poultry shows. That ignorance of the proprieties led to a reformation and the appointment of T. E. Orr as superintendent and a committee of three to look after the cooping and feeding, thanks to a healthy agitation of the matter in the poultry press and in the American Poultry Association. But the refusal of specials is still a Sherlock Holmes mystery.

Another special that was denied recognition was the Ivory Soap one hundred dollar cash prizes that go to the whitest and best conditioned birds washed and prepared with Ivory soap. This was considered an advertisement for the latter product. Suppose it is. Why deprive fanciers of the privilege of winning these cash specials, and, incidentally, teaching them the value of cleanliness and thoroughness in showing their birds? Is this not educational? And pray, what is a World's Fair intended to be? Is it educational or is it commercial, with evening digressions "Down the Pike?"

Read the clean cut rules on the exhibiting and judging of poultry at the Canadian Exposition, to be held at Toronto. Every exhibitor knows where he is at. There is no hap-hazard guess work about anything. Everything has been arranged by a committee that understands its business. The judges and their classes are boldly announced, the time judging begins is specified and also the time when it is to be completed. That is not only educational, but serves well from a disciplinarian standpoint.

This leads us up to another important point, one that is dwelt upon in the May number of Poultry Topics. We extract the following to show what the sentiment is in some sections:

"Now that the St. Louis World's fair poultry show is going to be the largest show of its kind ever held, there is going to be no small amount of work and real responsibility in handling the exhibits sent in care of the committee. As we understand the situation, the committee is not responsible for accidents, losses in handling or death from disease of any fowls entrusted to their care. And the fair management also will not be responsible for exhibits! Who, then, is to be responsible? Is a fancier to ship his choicest birds to ones who are not responsible for their care and conscientious attention after being received from the express companies? The latter can be made to stand for any losses while birds are in their care, providing the shipper buys a higher rate of expressage, by paying a certain per cent. on any valuation he desires. Plainly, this non-responsibility means that some exhibits will be kept at home. Those fanciers who are fortunate enough to have their birds sent in charge of some superintendent of a state's exhibit will be fairly safe, but those who do not, have no one to hold for the safe return of their birds. There is time for the matter to be fully taken up before the show and it would seem that the sooner, the better. We believe the committee appointed by the American Poultry Association is honorable and fair, and that they will treat fanciers as courteously as possible under the circumstances. It is entirely too easy, however, for the fair management to be irresponsible for the comfort and return of all birds exhibited. If any complaints would arise the committee would have to bear the brunt of them, thus the management gets the major portion of the benefits, while unpaid fanciers with he best wishes of the A. P. A. at heart would only incur the anathemas of those breeders who would be unfortunate to lose a bird or two. All poultry exhibitors cannot attend the fair nor can they afford a substitute as is the case in most other live stock departments, and it is only honest to protect their interests."

The above is a subject that has been discussed frequently among exhibitors of fine birds. Such men are exceedingly particular as to what shows they exhibit at and the assurance that the birds will be properly cooped and fed is not sufficient. They must feel that their birds will be returned from whence they came. If the World's Fair management disclaims responsibility for losses by theft or otherwise, there can be no redress, as the American Poultry Association cannot be held responsible, it having no legal right to manage, feed or coop or patrol exhibits. The committee of three in charge are acting as individuals only and cannot be held responsible. The superintendent of poultry, Mr. T. E. Orr, is a conscientious, faithful, hard-working official, and his duties are so onerous and manifold that responsibility for loss of exhibits should not be laid on his shoulders. That responsibility belongs to the managers of the St. Louis Fair. They should patrol, police and protect all exhibits, the same as other first-class exhibitions do.

Theodore Hewes, in the Inland Poultry Journal, pitches into the cooping committee at St. Louis in a very vigorous manner. He calls it a graft for the committee to charge one dollar a bird entry free when Spratt's Cooping Company offered to do the job for sixty cents, and on the basis of 10,000 entries, figures the rake-off for the committee to be about four thousand dollars. If Mr. Hewes will read the letter of the committee, published in this issue, he will find that arrangements are being made with Spratts to coop the show, and all monies left after paying the latter and making allowance for a reasonable compensation for each of the members of the committee, are to be distributed as prize money.

The fact that an one dollar entry fee is charged seems to us sound. It will tend to bring out quality of stock, whereas a lower fee would overburden the show with lower grades of stock.

The American Fancier has insisted right along that the American Poultry Association had no right to undertake the handling of entry fees or regulating the coop fees, and it is recorded that Messrs. Steinmesch, McGrew and Fishel are acting independently of the association in this cooping and feeding business. The mooted question now arises: Who is the proper custodian of the money received for entry fees at St. Louis?

Finis may be written in our diary against the 10th of this month as the last for sitting hens; it would be better if it were the day for the last of the chickens to hatch. I strongly advocate that we content ourselves with the chickens already running about and give them all time, food, and attention. Yet we may stretch a point if we cannot resist hatching a few more or calculate we have not sufficient. The eggs to be dealt with now should be those of the light, active, quick-maturing breeds. Chickens of the Leghorns, Hamburghs, Andalusians, Anconas, or Campines are likely to be of most service. It is too late to hatch the heavier and feathery breeds, for winter will catch them before they are fully developed, but many chickens of the breeds I first mentioned may turn out quite useful for the winter shows or egg production.—J. P. W. Marx, in the Feathered World.

The above advice may be just the thing in "Merry England," but this country, with its assortment of climates and propensity for holding the big shows late in the winter, it will not apply with any degree of success. June is a banner month for hatching and rearing chickens, especially for New England and New York. Not a few of the finest Brahmas and Cochins that find blue ribbons penned on their coops are hatched in June in the above sections. As to Leghorns, it just suits these egg machines to start life in the rare days of June, so as to be ready for laying in November, when eggs are scarce and high in price. A few miles from this city hens and eggs are just beginning to thaw out after a game of freeze-out lasting eight months.

Mr. Marx then proceeds to hand out the following excellent advice:

"I must again repeat what I have so often written—that the earliest chickens should never be neglected for the young ones. The difficulty of the chicken-rearer begins when his chickens are six or eight weeks old. So few of us think when we number a hundred or so chickens running with clucking hens what we are going to do with them as they grow older. We read every scrap of information about dry food or soft food, water or no water, when in truth with the most ordinary commonsense treatment there should be no difficulty in rearing the chickens while with their mothers. It is the afterwards, when the chickens are left to themselves, that we should seek for all the information we can get how to keep them well and growing. And only very few breeders know how to do it, and they are silent as to their method, if they have one; but certain it is that the clever man knows how to keep his chickens growing all along, particularly from the time they leave the hen. There is no doubt that chickens thrive better if older fowls are kept from them; such separation is most desirable, and should be carried out even at some cost and trouble. A chicken feeding pen, say 6 feet square, wherein the chickens can feed, with bars wide enough apart to admit the chickens, yet not so wide that the larger fowls can pass in, is a poor substitute for complete separation, but much better than nothing at all when old and young are mixed up together. Then separating the sexes so soon or even before it is obviously necessary is most helpful to the chickens' progress. I quite agree that a large run where chickens obtain plenty of exercise and natural food and enjoy a semi-wild method of life, ought to keep them healthy. Yet after some observation I have arrived at the conclusion that the chickens are better confined to a smaller area for about a fortnight to a month after the hen leaves them. I do not mean that they are better in a pen so crowded that wherever you look you see nothing but chickens, but about fifteen or a score in a pen, say, 50 feet square ought to do all right for a few week.s"

POULTRY COOPS AT THE WORLD'S FAIR.

The committee of the American Poultry Association appointed to look after the receiving, cooping, feed, exhibition and return of the ten thousand birds expected at the Universal Exposition at St. Louis next fall report satisfactory progress.

The gentlemen composing the committee are noted for their patriotic devotion to the best interests of the poultry industry and can be depended upon to wisely and economically discharge the duties assigned them by the American Poultry Association.

The following copy of a recent letter sent by the committee to the secretary of the Live Stock Department of the Universal Exposition will be read with interest by prospective exhibitors of poultry at the World's Fair:

St. Louis, Mo., May 15, 1904.

Col. Charles F. Mills, Secretary Live Stock Department, St. Louis, Mo.

Dear Sir:

I have the honor to report that the committee appointed by the American Poultry Association to assist the Universal Exposition of 1904 in receiving, cooping, exhibiting and returning the poultry, pigeons and pet stock have been actively at work perfecting arrangements for the duties assigned them and can report very satisfactory progress.

The prospects are encouraging for the early completion of very advantageous arrangements with Spratt's Patent of New York for the cooping of the World's Fair exhibits of poultry, pigeons and pet stock. The committee, in figuring on the number of cages that may be required have arranged to have a sufficient number on hand to meet every possible contingency. The committee have received such unanimous assurance of hearty and cordial support from prospective exhibitors as to leave no room for doubt as to the great extent and high character of the show of poultry, pigeons and pet stock that may be expected at the World's Fair.

If every cage and coop contracted for is taken up by exhibitors, it is likely that when all expenses are paid and a reasonable allowance made to the committee for their services, a surplus will remain, and this committee hereby recommend that such surplus be distributed pro rata as additional premium money for poultry, pigeons and pet stock.

Our committee further suggests that this announcement be published in the final prize-list of the Live Stock Department. Very respectfully,

HENRY STEINMESCH,
Chairman.

T. F. M'GREW,
U. R. FISHEL.

Mr. Howell, associate editor of The American Fancier, will furnish weekly reports on the egg and poultry market, and answer all questions submitted to him relating to commercial and practical poultry keeping. When replies are requested to be sent by letter, stamps must be enclosed and letters addressed to George E. Howell, 70 Christopher St., New York City.

EGGS.—Receipts for the week nearly 120,000 cases. The advance guard of spots and general uncertainty as to quality, has made its appearance, with the result that many shipments need a more careful candling, strictly high class and severally graded stock commanding an advantage of one-half cent in the market. We quote: York State, white, top quality, 21c; fancy mixed, 19c; western, 18c; Kentucky and other southern, 16 to 17c per doz.

POULTRY.—27 cars live fowls, and 5,800 packages dressed poultry. A few spring chickens appeared in this week's market and sold as high as $1 per pair, ruling price around 80c per pair, live weight; live fowls quoted at 13c; turkeys, 12c; ducks, western and southern, 60 to 90 cents per pair.

Dressed broilers, Phila., small, 40 to 50c, others up to 4 lb. to the pair, 30 to 40c; chickens, fancy roasting, 17c, average, 15c; fowls, 13c; spring ducks, 20c per lb.; old ducks, 15c; capons, large, 20c; small, 16c per lb.

We often see it stated of this or that person, as being successful. In a commercial sense, success means amassing money. Dame Fortune does not smile on all alike; for one it is ever onward, for another no apparent headway is discernable. With many there is failure before the crowning glory is reached. A case of this kind came to my notice recently. A young man brought up in the "chicken influence," upon reaching majority launched out for himself. Although near what ought to be a splendid market, his two attempts were both failures. Drifting to New York city and entering the wholesale egg business, he has surrounded himself with an ever increasing custom, until to-day, after the short interval of four years, we find him a member of the Mercantile Exchange and competing on its floors with the craftiest class of men for the choice morsels the arteries of commerce are bringing daily to the egg buyers of this great city. This is commercial success. Now what is successful poultry culture? Is it an ability to buy or breed the best? Is it a knack of selecting the right birds for a show, or an ability to fool a judge with a faked specimen?

Many a fancier with a flock of fine fowls and an oaken honesty of purpose has never tasted the fruits of success, in either prizes or dollars, either from a too fine sense of the proprieties or a lack of discernment. While an unscrupulous fakir with a shoe-string and a keen, if corrupt, mind will be able to carry everything before him at a show, and on the strength of his winnings and a little shrewd advertising, streams of money will pour into his pockets. That such success is neither honorable or lasting goes without argument; steady plugging and ever on the alertness wins in the end, and a rising man with such a record is the one that is looked up to. As we said before, it is gratifying to note the rise and advancement of any zealous person, but especially so to poultrymen to see a flock of thousands rise up from a handful of feathers.

Lately I read of a brother who six years ago started with a few common hens, and the second year bought pure bred stock with the profits. To-day the size of his flock is thirteen hundred laying hens, and the profits average two dollars each.

The greatest incentive to expansive breeding is a good market; knowing there is someone waiting to buy every egg a flock of hens can lay, urges the operator to expand his sphere of activity. A steady inflow of money urges him to his best efforts. As has been said many times previous, the great cause of failure in the chicken business is an unwillingness on the part of the owner to work and work hard .

A hen is a willing worker, but she wants co-operation. You cannot make a barrel without hoops, neither can a hen make an egg unless her wants are supplied, and to do these things as successful poultry keepers do them requires hard work.

Dr. Darlington, this city's health commissioner, tells us milkmen if we sell milk above a temperature of 50 degrees he will do lots of things, not because it is more palatable to this particular customer, but because the general health of the city is menaced when the product goes above the point indicated above.

There is no law which says the drinking water in the hen yard may not stand in the sun until it reaches a temperature of 90 degrees if the day is hot enough, but if the health of human beings is menaced at 50 degrees, it is a foolish owner who does not change the drinking water at regular and frequent intervals.

One of the rising hen editors wrote once upon a time about his experience with chicken lice and monthly poultry poultry journals, at the commencement of his chicken-raising career. It seems his first lot of chicks contracted the skeleton idea and dwindled away to nothing. He wrote to a monthly poultry paper and got a remedy, and in time to save the next year's hatch. Moral:—Take the American Fancier every week.

For the benefit of this editor who thinks one of our chicken thief laws here in York State designed for "night protection" might be inoperative in the "daytime," I would just like to remark that from his story his chicken lice worked "night and day."

A Quaker City poultryman has demonstrated that thirteen isn't a hoodoo in the hen business, as far as the Keystone State is concerned. He set three hens, the first over fifteen eggs; she hatched seven chicks, of which four died naturally, a strenuous neighborhood cat ate one, and a jealous hen picked the last one to death. The second hen covered seventeen eggs and hatched four chicks; but the third sat on thirteen eggs, hatched them all and is raising them all.

Although witchcraft had no terrors for the Quaker, bug-juice was too much for the turkeys of an Alburtis, Pa., farmer, who had gone to town to arrange the sale of one of the fattest flocks of turkeys ever raised in that section, and while absent some joker fed them corn soaked in whiskey. The old gobbler had suddenly gone crazy and the whole flock followed suit; they gobbled, fought and tore around the yard, then one by one fell dead. The farmer examined them and finding no injury, concluded they had been poisoned. He worked an hour digging a trench big enough to hold twenty-seven fat turkeys. By that time the old gobbler showed signs of coming to life and eventually the whole flock recovered, but were in danger of bursting from drinking so much water. Next!

THE WARMED HOUSE FOR HENS.

This house, which was erected in 1898, is 16 feet wide and 150 feet long. It faces the south and conforms nearly to the land surface, the east end being 3½ feet lower than the west end. The sills are of 4x6 inch hemlock, placed flat, upon a rough stone wall which rests upon the ground surface, and varies from one to two feet in height. The earth is graded up to within six inches of the sills on the outside. The floor timbers are 2x8 inches, placed 2½ feet apart, and rest on the sills. The studs for the back wall are 2x4 stuff, 5 feet 8 inches long, and rest on the sills. The front studs are 10 feet 6 inches long. All the studs are set 3 feet apart. Each 10 feet in length of the front of the building has one 12 light window of 10x12 glass. The top of this window comes within one foot of the plate. Directly underneath these windows and 6 inches above the floor, are other 3 light es above the floor, are other three light windows of 10x12 glass. The building is boarded, papered and shingled all over the outside, roof and walls. The floor is of two thicknesses of hemlock boards. The entire inside of the building is papered on the studs and rafters and sheathed with matched boards. The work was carefully done and good dead air spaces were obtained over the whole building.

The building is divided into 15 ten foot sections. The close partitions between the pens are 2 feet high and are made of 2 inch plank. They form strong trusses, to which the studs supporting the central plate are strongly nailed. This saves the floor from sagging from the weight of the roof when it is covered with snow. An elevated plank walk, 4 feet wide, runs along the whole length of the front of the building and rests on the cross partitions just mentioned. The walk is 2½ feet above the floor and allows the hens to occupy the whole floor space. This part of the floor is lighted from the front, by the small windows spoken of above. Above the close partition the pens are separated from each other and the walk by wire netting of 2 inch mesh. Light, wooden frame doors, covered with wire, and hung with double acting spring hinges, are in every cross partition, and also in the partition between the elevated walk and each pen.

The back ends of the cross partitions, 4 feet out from the back wall, are carried up to the roof, so as to protect the hens from currents of air while on the roosts. The roost platform is along the back wall. Four trap nests described beyond, of our own devising and construction, are placed at the back of the house, at the end of the roost platform.

All the windows are double. Eight of the large outside ones are hinged at the top and kept hasped out one foot at the bottom, except in the roughest weather, and cold winter nights. This furnishes ventilation without drafts, as the position of the outside windows prevents strong currents of air from entering.

Although this house was thoroughly built, we found that the windows had to be closed during rough winter weather, or water would freeze quite hard inside the building. Closing the windows caused dampness and frost on the walls, and the straw litter absorbed the moisture and became, while yet clean, disagreeable to the hens. A hot water heater was placed in a pit at the lower end of the building, and one line of two inch pipe was carried under the roosts to the upper end of the building and returned to the boiler. By use of this heater the building is kept above the freezing point at all times, and there is not much trouble from moisture except when extremely cold weather necessitates the closing of the windows.

The birds in this house have always been in excellent health, and have never shrunk in their egg yields from cold weather except one season, when coal was not procurable and the temperature ran low.

The ease with which the hens are cared for, the availability of the entire floor space, and the welfare and productiveness of the birds kept here, commends this building as one of the best. It was planned and constructed so as to obtain conditions necessary for the welfare of the birds and economize the labor involved in their care at as small cost as was consistent with quality. Not a single part was made for show. While a single walled building would have cost less, it would not have kept the hens warm or given protection from dampness, that prevails in close single-walled houses.

damp and lined with white frost in every cold weather, when the windows had to be shut to save the birds from suffering at night. Another feature against them was their size. A person can not care for hens in so small a pen without keeping them in a condition of unrest, for they fear being cornered in so small a room. Three years ago one of these 10 feet square houses was taken for a nucleus and an addition made, so that the reconstructed house was 10 feet wide and 25 feet long. The end of the old house was taken out, so that there was one room with a floor space of 250 square feet. The walls were about 5½ feet high in the clear, inside of the building. The whole of the front wall was not filled in, but a space 3 feet wide and 15 feet long was left just under the plate. This space had a frame, covered with white drilling, hinged at the top on the inside, so it could be let down and buttoned during driving storms and winter nights, but hung up out of the way at other times. The roost platform extended the whole length of the back of the room. It was 3 feet 4 inches wide and 3 feet above the floor. The back wall and up the roof for 4 feet was lined and packed hard with fine hay. The packing also extended part way across the ends of the room.

Two roosts were used, but they did not take the whole length of the platform, a space of 4 feet at one end being reserved for a crate where broody hens could be confined, until the desire for sitting should be overcome. The space, from the front edge of the platform up to the roof, was covered by frame curtains of drilling, similar to the one on the front wall. The cloth curtains were oiled with hot linseed oil. They were hinged at the top edge and kept turned up out of the way during day time, but from the commencement of cold weather until spring they were closed down every night after the hens went to roost. The hens were shut into this close roosting closet and kept there nights, and released as early in the morning as they could see to scratch for the grain which was sprinkled in the 8 inch deep straw on the floor.

The roosting closet was closely observed and has never been damp or its odors offensive when opened in the mornings. There was very little freezing in the closets in the coldest weather. The birds seemed to enjoy coming out of the warm sleeping closet down into the cold straw, which was never damp, but always dry, because the whole house was open to the outside air and sun every day. There were no shut off corners of floor or closet that were damp. We used this building through three winters, with 50 hens in it, and have not had a case of sickness in it yet. Not a case of cold or snuffles has developed from sleeping in the closet with its cloth front, and then going directly down into the cold room and spending the day in the open air.

The birds have laid as well as their mates in the large warmed house have done; averaging last year above 150 eggs each. Their combs have been red and their plumage bright, and they have given every evidence of perfect health and vigor. While they are on the roosts, in bed, they are warm. They come down to their breakfasts and spend the day in the open air. Such treatment gives vigor and snap to the human, and it seems to work equally well with the hen.

The results of the three years' use of this house have been such that we feel very sure that this is one of the right systems of treatment and housing of hens, and it was decided to build several houses on the same plan and join them together under one roof, as one house.

THE CURTAIN FRONT HOUSE FOR HENS.

This building was erected in 1903 and is 14 feet wide and 150 feet long. The back wall is 5½ feet high from floor to top of plate inside, and the front wall is 6 2-3 feet high. The roof is of unequal span, the ridge being 4 feet in from the front wall. The height of the ridge above the floor is 9 feet. The sills are 4x6 inches in size and rest on a rough stone wall laid on the surface of the ground. A central sill gives support to the floor which at times is quite heavily loaded with sand. The floor timbers are 2x8 inches in size and are placed 2 feet apart. The floor is two thicknessed of hemlock boards. All of the rest of the frame is 2x4 inch stuff. The building is boarded, papered and shingled, on roof and walls. The rear wall and 4 feet of the lower part of the rear roof, are ceiled on the inside of the studding and plates, and packed, very hard, with dry sawdust. In order to make the sawdust packing continuous between the wall and roof, the wall ceiling is carried up to within 6 inches of the plate, then follows up inclining pieces of studding to the rafters. The short pieces of studding are nailed to the studs and rafters. By this arrangement there are no slack places around the plate to admit cold air. The end walls are packed in the same way. The house is divided by close board partitions into seven 20 foot sections; and one 10 foot section is reserved at the lower end for a feed storage room.

Each of the 20 foot sections has two 12 light, outside windows screwed onto the front, and the space between the windows, which is 8 feet long, and 3 feet wide, down from the plate, is covered during rough winter storms and cold nights by a light frame, covered with 10 ounce duck, closely tacked on. This door, or curtain, is hinged at the top and swings in and up to the roof when open.

A door 2½ feet wide is in the front of each section. The roost platform is at the back side of each room and extends the whole 20 feet. The platform is 3 feet 6 inches wide and is 3 feet above the floor. The roosts are of 2x3 inch stuff placed on edge and are 10 inches above the platform. The back one is 11 inches out from the wall and the space between the two is 16 inches, leaving 15 inches between the front roost and the duck curtain, which is sufficient to prevent the curtain being soiled by the birds on the roost. The two curtains in front of the roost are similar to the one in the front of the house. They are each 10 feet long and 30 inches wide, hinged at the top, and open out into the room and fasten up when not in use. Great care was exercised in constructing the roosting closets, to have them as near air tight as possible, excepting what may be admitted through the cloth curtain.

Single pulleys are hung at the rafters, and with half inch rope fastened to the lower edge of the curtain frames they are easily raised or lowered and kept in place. At one end of the roosts, a space of 3 feet is reserved for a cage for broody hens. This being behind the curtain, the birds have the same night temperature when they are transferred from the roosts to the cage.

Six trap nests are placed at one end of each room, and four at the other. They are put near the front so that the light may be good for reading and recording the number on the leg bands of the birds. Several shelves are put on the walls, 1½ feet above the floor, for shell, grit, bone, etc. The doors which admit from one room to another, throughout the building, are frames covered with 10 ounce duck, so as to make them light. They are hung with double acting spring hinges. The advantages of having all doors push from a person are very great, as they hinder the passage of the attendant, with his baskets and pails, very little. Strips of old rubber belting are nailed around the studs which the doors rub against as they swing to, so as to just catch and hold them from opening too easily by the wind. Tight board partitions were used between the pens instead of wire, so as to prevent drafts. A platform 3 feet wide, extends across both ends and the entire front of the building, outside.

The house is well made of good material and should prove to be durable. It costs about $850. A rougher building with plain instead of trap nests, with the roof and walls covered with some of the prepared maters, instead of shingles, could be built for less money, and would probably furnish as comfortable quarters for the birds for a time, as this building will.

This house accommodates 350 hens —50 in each 20 foot section. It was not ready for occupancy until the 6th of December. Since then there has been some very severe weather, considerably below zero at night and about zero during the day, with a good deal of high wind. During this rough weather the bedding on the floor has kept comparatively dry; and the voidings on the platform, as found when the curtains were raised in the morning, have been but slightly frozen. The yield of eggs during this severe weather and the week immediately following it, were not below those immediately preceding it. It should be borne in mind that had the weather been mild during that time the hens probably would have increased in production rather than remain stationary. They were doubtless affected by the severe weather, but not seriously, as they began to increase in production very soon after the weather became usual for midwinter.

My Dear Sir:—I have just arrived at the opinion that you and I have been making monkeys out of ourselves (was a long time on the way eh). You borrowwed birds, I borrowed birds, in fact most all good breeders borrows birds and why should we lamboost each other. You have recently been trying to let go, but I have been such a dog-goned fool that I did not grasp the idea sooner. THE REFUSE FROM THE MANUFACTURE OF SUGAR OF MILK A VALUABLE POULTRY FOOD.

(From New York Tribune Farmer.)

Milk has always afforded an attractive field for scientific investigation, its possibilities seeming practically limitless, and its uses comprise a long list of articles that have become almost indispensable. Everything from an infant food to cold water paint has been gotten out of the lacteal fluid, and now there comes an entirely new product, made from what has heretofore been an absolute waste. It is the refuse that is left from the process of manufacturing sugar of milk. This waste contains all of the albumen that was in the original milk, and many other important elements of food, which, when properly prepared and put into a balanced ration, makes a valuable poultry food, the albumen being so essential to egg formation. This important discovery has been made something in this manner.

For a number of years, Mr. Myron H. Bent, formerly editor of the Antwerp, N. Y., Gazette, has been a successful poultryman, and about a year ago it occurred to him that the waste produced at the factory of the National Milk Sugar company at that place ought to make an admirable poultry food when properly fed, being derived, as it was, from milk, which everyone who has kept hens knows to be excellent for fowls at all times. Therefore he commenced to experiment systematically and immediately obtained good results. A separate flock gained from 30 to 40 per cent over its previous record when it was fed on meat scrap for animal food, and when the new food was discontinued the egg yield fell back to its old figure, but picked up at once when the new food was fed again. Thereafter Mr. Bent fed it to his entire flock throughout the year and obtained most satisfactory and gratifying results, securing nearly 9,000 eggs from about sixty Brown Leghorns during the year. This is not an unheard-of record, but we venture to say that but a few poultrymen obtain it from a whole flock that is yarded practically throughout the year. The fowls were fed no other animal food and molted out in the fall better than ever before and never entirely stopped laying. The flock was always healthy and contented, losing but two fowls during the year, one of which was appropriated for a midnight meal by a friendly polecat. It seems to be just the food for winter eggs and growing stock. Mr. Bent won second prize at the recent state fair on a pen of his breed that was reared on this food. It it simply concentrated skim milk, but is even much more desirable, because it is in a dry form and can be fed in any desired quantity without soiling the fowls' plumage. An analysis of the product shows that it contains nearly 50 per cent. protein, about 15 per cent. of which is clear albumen; also 15 to 20 per cent. fat, the balance being ash, lime, water, etc. It is one of the richest protein foods known and cannot fail to be admirably adapted to poultry uses. This discovery will no doubt interest all poultrymen, as hundreds of tons of this valuable food annually go to waste that ought to be worth two to three cents per pound. Mr. Bent will answer any questions in regard to it if stamps are enclosed.

BEANS AND REFUSE FOR POULTRY.

The canniest hen woman I know has fed beans to her flock all winter. She claims an increased egg yield from their use. Taking into account the fact that the hens were not particularly well housed, and their other rations consisted of corn, oats and buckwheat, I am inclined to join her in this opinion says a writer in the "Rural New Yorker." Beans are rich in proteids and carbohydrates. In this instance they helped to furnish the consistents for eggs, for when everybody's hens were loafing this flock were attending strictly to their duties. I may say that the biddies took up the bean habit themselves In the fall the beans were cooked twice a week for the pigs. The hens would crowd about the receptacle in which the beans were placed and eat a repletion when they could get an abundance of other food. By the time they they went into winter quarters they were laying well, and they continued to so all winter. A percentage of the bean crop is unmarketable from being broken and stained. If simple cooking will convert this waste into a valuable food for the poultry shall we not go and do likewise?

There is another product of the bean thrasher for which I wish to speak a word of praise; that is the dry fine dirt which comes from the rollers bushels and bushels of it. One is often too much hurried in the busy season to secure an adequate supply of dry earth for winter use. The bean thrasher will do this for you and deposit it upon the barn floor, all ready to be shoveled into barrels. Not a pound shall be wasted on our premises so long as we keep hens. The fowls love to scratch and dust themselves in it, one member of the family even declares they eat it, this in addition to its advantages as an absorbent. Save the bean dust and your fowls will be healthier and happier. Alma Cole Pickering in Commercial Poultry.

MUSCOVY DUCKS.

The Muscovy Duck that has been so extensively domesticated was originally brought from tropical South America, where it is indigenous, the name is a corruption of Mush-duck, to-day they are one of our most useful and ornamental breeds of ducks. They still show their wild bringing up, in a number of their characteristics the manner of their mating and of the duck's habits of selecting her nest and their habit of flying, all show their wild origin. To those wishing an ornamental as well as a useful duck, the Muscovy will be found to be just what is wanted. Their large size, and the fact that they never quack like other ducks makes them very desirable where noise is not wanted, they are of a quiet disposition and very tame and very hardy, do well in confinement, with only enough water to drink and are splendid foragers when turned out to roam, the ducks are good layers, excellent mothers and hatch and raise their young successfully and without much care. They need very little shelter, an open shed answering for winter quarters. I have known of cases of ducks sitting on twenty-five eggs and hatching as many ducks. I usually give them fifteen eggs and expect and get as many young ducks. If at large they will select most secluded places for their nests, and when leaving the nest will always cover their eggs with down, feathers, etc.

The drakes are much larger than the ducks, weighing ten or twelve pounds, the ducks weighing six to eight pounds. As a table duck they cannot be excelled, young drakes will dress seven and eight pounds, they are more like a wild duck or goose in flavor than other ducks, and will hold their condition longer than any other duck. They will be found always ready for the table without extra feeding. There are two standard varieties of them, the colored and the white, the colored being the most popular and the handsomest, they should conform to the following description: Head rather long and in the drake large, the top being covered with long crest-like feathers, which are readily elevated or depressed by the bird which it becomes excited or alarmed, in color the head should be glossy black and white, with dark horn colored bill, rather short and of medium width, head and face should be covered with bright red caruncles, the larger the better. Neck of medium length and well arched, color black or black and white, black predominating. Back should be long, broad and somewhat flat, with long lustrous blue black feathers. Breast broad and full and body long and broad, in color lustrous blue black and black and white. Wings very long and stout, coverts with lustrous green black. Tail rather long, with an abundance of stiff plumage, and in color black or white. Thighs should be straight, with strong nails and dark lead or black in color. The white variety should be pure white throughout, free from any yellow tinge, pinkish flesh colored beak, blue or gray eyes, and pale orange or yellow shanks and toes. To all those wanting the finest duck there is for the table, and one of the oddest and most ornamental, let them select the grand old Muscovy and they will rejoice.—H. M. Carpenter.

THE HATCHING OF CHICKENS FROM PRESERVED EGGS

The London Lancet recently published an article describing some experiments which had been made for the purpose of determining whether eggs could be hatched which had been preserved for twelve months by immersion in a ten per cent solution of sodium. It was said in the article that chickens had been hatched from these eggs. A correspondent of the Lancet now writes to that journal, narrating some experiments which friends of his undertook for the purpose of verifying the statements made. Twelve eggs were collected in June, and immediately placed in a ten per cent. solution of sodium silicate and completely covered by the solution. On September 5 four eggs were taken from the solution and marked, and with nine other newly-laid eggs were placed under a hen. All the newly-laid eggs hatched out within three weeks, but the four preserved eggs did not hatch. One of these eggs was boiled and was quite fresh; the other three were broken and the yolk fell out separately from the white. The whites were whipped up and became quite stiff. This is stated to be the best test of a fresh egg. It is of interest to note that these preserved eggs, even when they had been incubated for three weeks, still remained perfectly fresh, seeming to indicate that their shells were still impermeable to external influences.

Assuming that the remarkable preserving effect of the sodium silicate is due to the formation of an insoluble glass with the lime salts of the substance of the shell, it is curious that it has been possible to hatch out a chicken without first making the shell again permeable to air. This experiment is one which should be repeated after the shell has by some method again been rendered permeable, for it seems improbable that the hatching of such preserved eggs can take place if the shell remains impermeable to air.—Scientific American.

COSTLY CHICKEN RAISING.

Miss Georgia Buist, of Lincoln, Kan., said her mother was too slow in the chicken business, and that she would show the old fogies how do it .So Georgia bought a nice new incubator and set it up in the barn. The first night the incubator caught fire and burned up the most of the barn, a lot of furniture stored in it, a couple of buggies, a six weeks old calf and all of mother's setting hens. And mother says the young things of these days are not half so smart as they think are.—Kansas City Journal.

IT'S A CINCH

to breed the BUFF WYANDOTTE winners if one has the right kind of stock, SUITABLY MATED. It's one thing to secure individuality, but to reproduce or BREED ON, it's absolutely necessary that a specimen's ancestry for A TERM OF YEARS be of the very best of it's time. "Like begets like," OR LIKE ITS ANCESTRY—more often perhaps the latter. What does prove a success from a breeder's standpoint is INDIVIDUALITY BACKED UP WITH A RICH INHERITANCE of first prize winners for many generations. So far, doubtless you agree with me. Now, where better can you find the desired NICKING qualities than from a strain that has been successfully maintained before the public since the origin of the breed?

For FIVE YEARS IN SUCCESSION we have won at New York or Boston THREE OF THE FIRST PRIZES; one year winning ALL THE FIVE FIRSTS AT NEW YORK; another year ALL FIRSTS AT BOSTON, save on pen; each year winning MORE FIRSTS THAN ALL COMPETITORS COMBINED . . . . . .

We have birds for sale that descend straight from these first prize winners. Past years matings were headed by such males as follows: 1-3-5 COCKS, 2 and 3 OPEN CLASS, and 1 and 2 PEN COCKERELS, BOSTON, 1903, also the sires of the four mentioned cockerels, Talk about male producing strains, WHERE IS ITS EQUAL? We don't charge any more for OUR KIND than those claimed to be (?) just as good. Write us for anything you want.

We shall sell eggs at $3.00 per thirteen straight. We are now preparing a circular giving our method of mating which has proven so successful. It is free to those who send for it. Egg orders booked now for future delivery, insuring shipment when wanted. (Send for Catalogue.)

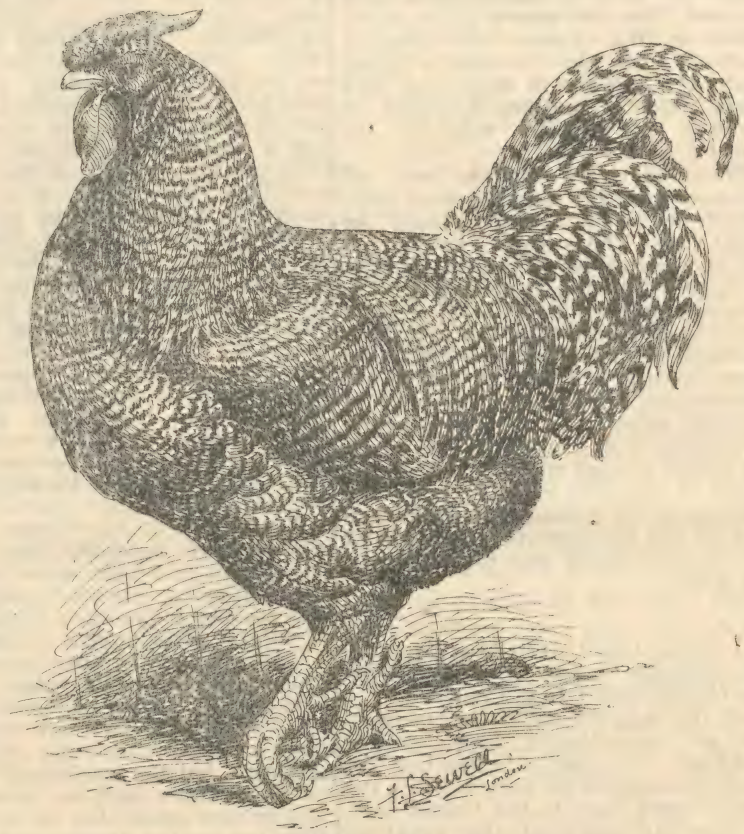
DANISH POULTRY RAISING

Uuited States Government Report.

Mr. J. Pedersen-Bjergaard, of Copenhagen, writer on the subject of poultry and egg production, editor of the Poultry Yard, the official journal of the Society for Remunerative Poultry Culture, and who is also author of a comprehensive and very much appreciated work on the subject of poultry culture for profit, has furnished this consulate with some interesting facts regarding the history of poultry raising and egg production in Denmark.



Poultry raising was looked upon by the Danish farmers up to within a few years ago as a "necessary evil," which could not well be dispensed with. A few hens were kept on the farms, and were given little or no attention. The eggs produced were few and small, and commanded in the home market less than half the present price. No attempts were made to export eggs before 1867. In that year, and until 1871, a few thousand scores of eggs were annually exported. This caused an advance in the home market price, and an increase in the number of hens kept. In the fiscal year, 1870-71, 50,000 dozen eggs were exported; in 1871-72 the export jumped to 555,000 dozens; and the following fiscal year, 1872-73, the increase was remarkable, the total export of domestic eggs being 2,310,000 dozens. After 1880 there was a gradual increase in the quantity of eggs exported.

In 1895, the date of the organization of the Danish Co-operative Egg Export Association, the value of the export of domestic eggs was $1,947,000, of which the co-operative company handled $21,683 worth. In 1896 Denmark exported 20,379,000 dozens of domestic eggs, receiving for them $3,459,000. Of this amount the co-operative company received $188,500. In 1902 the exports of domestic eggs reached 35,967,000 dozens, or $6,451,000 worth, of which the co-operative company received $1,087,000. Official Danish statistics for 1903 are not yet available.

When it is borne in mind that the small farmer, with from two to eight acres, is the one who is profiting by this remarkable growth in the egg export business, the importance of the whole subject becomes more evident.

There are three well-known poultry societies in Denmark, which have for their object the creation of an active, intelligent enthusiasm for the poultry business. The youngest of these societies—Society for Remunerative Poultry Culture—is said to best serve the Danish farmer, since it has for its sole aim (unlike the other societies) the creation of an interest in practical, remunerative poultry culture. The society, while paying due attention to the importance of pure breeds of poultry, deprecates paying too much attention to "fancy" breeding. The society concentrates its energies upon such practical measures as may be expected to result in an increase of income, especially for the numerous class of small farmers owning from four to eight acres of land. To this class the annual cost of membership in the society is twenty-seven cents. Among other advantages enjoyed for this small fee is subscription to the official journal, issued twice each month.

It is just to claim, therefore, that the society is purely patriotic. The manager of the Co-operative Egg Export company testifies enthusiastically to the splendid educational work accomplished by the various poultry societies. The societies and the export company are entirely separate in their organization. Naturally, however, they attract very much the same membership, and the work of the co-operative company and the societies necessarily harmonizes and is corelative. They supplement each other. The societies, with their official papers, reach the farmers quickly, and are able to impress them with any facts which changed conditions in the foreign market may render it profitable for the farmers to know. It is in this educational way that the societies are of incalculable value to their members. Located in Copenhagen, where the head office of the co-operative company is situated, the societies and the company are in closest sympathy.

CUCKOO DORKING.

The leading authorities on the subject of poultry raising in Denmark maintain that breeds of hens having a "good strain" should be kept on the farm. They do not advocate "blooded stock." The aim of all the central organizations, including the agricultural department of the Government, is to induce the farmers to produce the greatest number of eggs possible of good size. All authorities agree upon this point, i. e., that the most profitable hen for the farmer is the one which will lay the greatest number of eggs weighing no more and no less than 12½ quints each (7.27 eggs per pound).

In the United States the question of quality of poultry meat is important. Here it is considered to be of little or no importance. "Laying qualities," with particular attention to the size of the eggs produced, is the subject which has claimed the attention of those who devote themselves to building up the poultry business of Denmark. The English market is the basis upon which the whole egg production business of Denmark has been built. The Danish people have discovered that the Englishman wants an egg weighing 12½ quints, and so the Danes furnish them eggs of this size to the extent of 30,000,000 to 40,000,000 dozens a year, receiving for them more per dozen than any other country in the English market, and 3.3 cents more per dozen than the average price paid to all countries by the Englishmen.

Mr. Bjergaard, who is perhaps the closest student of this subject of breeds in Denmark, informs me that the so-called Mediterranean breeds—the Leghorns, Spanish, Minorcas, and the Andalusians—have enjoyed the greatest popularity in Denmark; that the brown Leghorns are perhaps most commonly met with, either pure or more or less mixed with other pure breeds or with the old Danish fowl; that there are rather better strains of the white Leghorns, in point of egg-laying capacity, than of any other other fowl. The Minorcas are very common and very popular, as they lay good-sized eggs. Of the breeds above mentioned the Andalusians are the least popular.

Plymouth Rocks and Wyandottes are known here and appreciated; they are used as extensively for crossing with the Mediterranean breeds as for pure breeding. The Langshans and the Orpingtons are known, the latter breed being classed as about on a par with the American breeds mentioned (Plymouth Rocks and Wyandottes), somewhat superior in the quality of the meat, but on the whole less popular.

The Brahmas and Cochins are not in favor, being considered coarse, greedy feeders unprofitable, and altogether too inclined to brooding. Of the fine meated French breeds the Faverolles are best adapted, and bid fair to become popular. Other French breeds are not hardy in this country.

Arrangements are now being made for carrying on experiments as to egg-laying qualities of various pure breeds. It is proposed to announce the results for the benefit of the farmers when results are obtained.

Incubators are used to a considerable extent, but the most popular brooder is the turkey. The turkey is said to be gentle, tractable, and easily induced to brood. If confined for two or three days in early spring before they begin laying, turkey hens almost invariably may be induced to brood.

There is little specialization in poultry or egg production. Specializing is no encouraged. There are but a few large poultry establishments in the kingdom. Egg production is looked upon as an excellent adjunct to other agricultural pursuits. The aditor of the Poultry Yard says:—

"For every farmer of the country, especially those who have only a few acres, a certain additional income from a well-managed little flock of fowls is our ideal."

Co-operative marketing of farm produce is reduced to a perfect system in Denmark.

The Danish Co-operative Egg Export Association has a membership of 33,500 farmers, divided into 500 local societies, or circles, each circle being an integral part of the central company, and subject to the control and supervision of the central organization. Each circle has its own by-laws, but such by-laws must conform to the provisions of those of the central organization. Naturally, therefore, the by-laws of the 500 circles are quite uniform. Each circle collects, at its own expense, the eggs produced on the farms of its members, and prepares them for shipment to one of the eight general shipping centres at its own expense. After leaving the circle (the local collecting centre) all expenses are borne by the company. Profit-sharing is absolute.

The by-laws of the co-operative company declare that the "principal object of the company shall be to build up the most profitable trade in Danish eggs in foreign countries." To this end the company guarantees to purchasers that all eggs delivered by the company shall be new-laid and clean, each egg being stamped by the company's registered trade mark for new laid eggs.

No circle of less than ten members is admitted to membership in the company. Each circle on being admitted pays into the company 13½ cents per circle member. Each circle admitted is obliged to deliver all eggs collected from its members to the company. Eggs over seven days old must not be delivered, under penalty of a fine of $1.34 for the first offence, and double that for further offences A circle must not keep eggs longer than four days after collection before sending them to a general shipping station of the company. The eggs must be delivered absolutely clean. Each egg must be stamped plainly both with the number of the circle and with the number of the member of the circle delivering the egg. Each circle must provide its members with stamping ink and rubber stamps bought of the purveyor indicated by the company.

Each member of a circle must forward all eggs produced, except those needed for home consumption and for hatching. Eggs must be carefully gathered every day, and in hot summer days twice each day. Only artificial nest-eggs must be used, and the nests must be barred at night.

Each circle is governed by a circle board, consisting of an uneven number of members. This board provides for the expense of collection and superintends crating for shipment to central stations.

The eggs are shipped by the 500 circles to one of the central shipping stations in ordinary cardboard egg crates set in pine boxes of uniform size.

The work of grading and testing is done mostly by women, who become very expert. The eggs are graded according to weights. There are six recognized classes, ranging from 6½ to 9 kilograms per 120 eggs (1.43 to 2lb per dozen eggs).

The expert graders work behind a long table, upon which they have six wooden egg racks, or frames, each frame with ten dozen holes in which the eggs are placed. The graders can tell at a glance to which grade an egg belongs, and they distribute them very deftly. When a frame is filled with ten dozen eggs (which are taken directly from the boxes received from the circles), the frames are taken by a man and weighed. If the 120 eggs weigh too much or too little for the grade for which they are intended, eggs are taken out and substituted with larger or smaller ones, as the case may be. The frame of 120 eggs is taken into a small, tightly-closed room and set on top of a hopper-shaped box, which is about 2ft deep, the sides of which are line with looking-glass. The bottom of this hopper-shaped box s about 8in. by 30in. Four 16-candle-power electric lights stand up from the bottom, equal distances apart. The eggs, as above indicated, are placed over these lights and looking glasses, thick ends up. The tester looks carefully and and through each egg, and if any be unsound they are rejected.

The eggs are then carefully and snugly packed, side by side, with nothing between them, in four layers, in pine boxes 22in by 72 in, 9in deep. Between each layer of eggs is a substantial layer of straight, clean rye straw; on the top layer of eggs another layer of straw: the thin boards are securely nailed on, the boxes are properly marked with the company's trade mark, the number of eggs, and the grade indicated, and are then sent to the ship. All eggs are sold by the pound f. o. b.

The co-operative company pays all expenses from the time the eggs leave the circles until they are placed on board ship. The average expense is 6 ore (1.5 cents) per kilogram (2.2lb). In other words, the expense is a trifle over one cent per dozen.

The cost of collecting the eggs from the farmers and bringing them to the circle centres is borne by the circles themselves. This work is done by a collector selected by the circle board. The collector is usually paid so much per pound of eggs collected. The expense of this collection is very low, perhaps on an average not more than two ore per kilogram (0.5 cent per 2.2 lb.), or something less than 0.5 cent per dozen.

The total cost to the farmer from the time the eggs leave the nests until they are on board steamer is therefore 1½ cents per dozen. English buyers pay for the eggs f. o. b. Denmark.

All the eggs shipped from Denmark are not co-operative eggs, strictly speaking. However, it is true that the great commercial advantage which the Danish eggs have in the British market over the eggs from other countries is due to co-operation.

About 25 per cent. of the co-operative eggs exported are pickled. It is here, of course, that the greatest profit it made. The process of pickling is the ordinary lime water process, with some additional secret processes. The minimum price paid by the company during the year at different times illustrates the important point of how confidence on the part of consumers increases the value of a product. In 1898 the lowest price paid to the farmer in the height of the summer seasen was 50 ore (13 cents) per kilogram; in 1901, 60 ore (16 cents) per kilogram; and in 1903, 68 ore (18 cents) per kilogram (2.2lb).—Roymond R. Frazier, Consul, Copenhagen, Denmark.

THE HISTORY OF DOMESTIC FOWLS.

We brought down our tracing of poultry literature to the time of Gervas Markman, in 1631, and we may pass thence over the whole of the eighteenth century without finding one author whose works deserve quoting upon the subject. We have referred to Mortimer's "Whole Art of Husbandry," published in 1708, and to many others, and find that where they are prolix they borrow from the ancients, and where they write from their own experience they are brief and unsatisfactory. Thus, Mortimer says, "As for cocks and hens, I shall not enter into a description of the several sorts of them, only advising you to choose those that are the best breeders and the best layers;" and similar offhand, half-contemptuous sentences might be quoted from other writers of that century, showing how little was the value placed upon this kind of stock, and that no attention was bestowed on its improvement.

The first work that we know of showing the dawn of better attention to this description of farming stock is Mr. Bonington Mowbray's Practical Treatise on Breeding, Rearing and Fattening all Kinds of Domestic Poultry. This first appeared in 1816, between which time and the present date we believe it has passed through many editions; at all events, the eighth, dated 1842, is now before us. The author understood his subject, wrote from experience, and gives us this first evidence of care and system that we have met with in relation to this branch of rural affairs. He says:—

"I have throughout my life been a breeder and keeper, and also an amateur, of domestic poultry, pigeons, and rabbits; at some periods upon rather a considerable scale, and have for many years together kept a register of the results. I have further done that which, I believe, no other man has taken the pains to do—kept a regular stud-book for those breeders, scarcely one of which was so poor as to be without a name; and Regulus, Samson, Flea-catcher, Selima, Moreau, Isaac, and Tom Paine, shine with peculiar lustre on my poultry and pigeon list; whilst Corney, Buttercup, Adam, Beelzebub, Lucifer, Carolina, Hecuba, make a figure equally splendid and equally useful among the rabbits. I think Montaigne says somewhere, that if a man would sit and describe that which he has known practically, upon almost any subject, he could scarcely fail of being useful. Just so far my ambition extends. Nor is the world entirely without need of advice on this subject, notwithstanding its antiquity and the multitude of counsellors."

Every page of his volume testifies that he wrote down only the results of experience, and from these, as from other authors, we shall place before our readers a specimen. In speaking of raising early broods, he says:—

"The number of hens to one cock, four to six, the latter being the extreme, with a view of making the utmost advantage. Ten and even twelve hens have been formerly allowed to one cock, but the produce of eggs and chickens under such an arrangement will seldom equal that to be obtained from the smaller number of hens. Everyone is aware that the spring is the best season to commence poultry, and, in truth, it scarcely matters how early, presupposing the best food, accommodation, and attendance under which hens may be permitted to sit in January; but to attempt to rear winter chickens in this climate, even in a carpeted room, and with a constant fire, would in all probability he found abortive. I have repeatedly made the experiment with some scores without being able to preserve an individual through the winter, and nearly the same has resulted with respect to pigs on a damp, clayey, or marshy soil. This request should be understood with some grains of allowance in respect to the soils on which my stock of both kinds was reared in three counties. They were clayey, wet, and benumbing, and my neighbors were in a similar predicament with myself. It is a mere statement of facts. I have referred in the sequel to those dry soils, better adapted to breeding of poultry, as they are also to breeding and keeping of sheep. I give merely my own actual experience, without doubting that many breeders more fortunately situated have succeeded with winter stock, though in the best situations winter may bring with it considerable rick. A record, however, of the experimented fact may remain as a caution to breeders upon unfavorable soils. The following is a remarkable instance of attention and success in winter breeding.

"The late Mrs. Adams, of Ditchford Farm, near Shipton-on-Stour, in Worcestershire, for many years devoted her time and attention to the breeding and rearing of winter chickens and spring ducklings, with which she constantly attended Campden and Shipton markets, where her poultry was sought by the neighboring gentry with avidity, and generally fetched good prices. The superiority of this woman's poultry was proverbial; as a breeder and fancier she stood pre-eminent; her chickens were always ready for the table by New Year's Day, and her ducks were earlier in the market than those of any other person in that neighborhood. This is given not as a novelty, but as an example of merit and successful perseverence. In the vicinity of most cities and large towns, chicks and ducklings are reared in the autumn for the Christmas market. The business is done by the aid of artificial heat, by stoving, and with covered floors."

Next appeared, in 1845, Poultry: their breeding, rearing, diseases, and general management, by Walter B. Dickson. This is far superior, as a compilation, to any other work we know on the subject. There are gathered together, and arranged in its pages, all the information that is scattered through out county Agricultural Surveys, the French works of MM. Reaumur and Parmentier, etc., and he includes in his extracts many from Markham, and, indeed, all his English predecessors who wrote on the subject. The following is a favorable specimen of his writing:—

"The Colors of Fowls.—The varieties in the sizes, forms, and colors of fowls are sufficiently striking to attract the notice of the most indifferent observer; while, to those who can find subject of reflection in every production of Nature, they may be made an ample source of interesting remark, as well as of amusing incident. 'If people,' says M. Reaumur, 'are affected with the kind of pleasure so transitory to the most enthusiastic florists, who procure it but for a few days by a world of care and toil continued through a whole year—if they are affected by the variety and fine combination of colors in their favorite flowers, the poultry yard, when well managed, may be made to offer them endless pleasures of the same description.'

"The greater number of cocks, even those of the commonest breeds, when exposed to the play of the sun's rays, exhibit the brightest colors, in extraordinary beauty, and varied mixture; FANCIER—4 eta shn and even the hens, if the breeds have been select, are often no less worthy of admiration. Some, for instance, have spots distributed with great regularity, and so brightly white as to look silvery; others are termed golden, because they are spotted or speckled with a fine golden orange color; while the more common colors are varied in a manner almost endless; and, upon the whole, domestic fowls offer a multitude of colors, the several shades of which would be found with difficulty, if they were sought for amongst the birds of the woods on the waters.

"Another peculiarity in the color of fowls is that they frequently change in a very surprising manner from the time when the chicks cast their down to the annual moult of the full-grown fowls. It is, no doubt, the regular process, at least after the second and third moults, for the colors to continue much the same. I have at present a hen of the Spanish breed which has been of a uniform black for two successive moults, but has now her neck, wings, and tail feathers tipped with pure white. I have another which was all over of a silver grey, but has now her head and neck coal black, with a ring of fine white at the base of the neck, while the rest of the body is finely speckled with black and snow white. It is remarkable also that this change took place in a few weeks without any obvious moult, so as to cause her to appear anywhere bare of feathers.

"We are told by M. Reaumur, that one of his hens which his poultry-woman distinguished from the rest by a crooked claw, when her coat began to be taken notice of, had feathers of a ruddy color mixed with the brown so common among dunghill fowls. A year afterwards, this hen was observed to become almost black, with here and there some large white spots. After the second moulting, black was the predominant color on every part of the body; but, strange to tell, upon the succeeding moult, white was the predominant color, and only a few black patches about the size of a crown-piece could be observed. Upon the succeeding moult, all the black spots disappeared, and the hen became uniformly of a pure white like that of a swan. As she was at this time old for a fowl—that is, not less than ten years, it might be thought that old age, which whitens the human hair, likewise whitens the feathers of certain breeds; but, in this case, M. Reaumur says the transition from the ruddy to the white ought not to have been made, as it really was, through the black; and he wos of opinion, as the hen was still vigorous and health, that she might again change her color, if she lived, to brown or black.

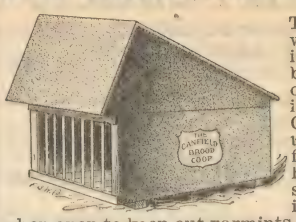
"M. Reaumur makes some interesting remarks on a cock which he observed with more attention than the hen, so as to establish proofs that the white colors of the feathers were not, at least in that instance, caused by age. The owner of the cock was struck, the first time he moulted, with the singular change in his color; and for five successive moults there was always a considerable change of color. In his first year he had some of the ruddy brown, mixed with white, so common in dunghill cocks; in the second he was all over ruddy brown, or rather red, without any white; in the third he became uniformly black; in the fourth uniformly white; and in the fifth, when he was presented by the prior of Bury to M. Reaumur as a curiosity, he had white feathers mixed with a good deal of ruddy color and brown, bordering upon chestnut, his neck, back, wings, and belly being ruddy, and even where there were white feathers, they were mingled with ruddy ones. During the summer vacation at Paris, M. Reaumur was two months without seeing the cock, but in this perior he became so changed as not to be recognizable, his feathers having become all over of the finest white. The following year he had partly white feathers, but the greater portion was ruddy, or rather of a fair red. Here, then, was a transition from white to a light brown, indicating that the whiteness of his feathers was not owing to the number of his years.

"I has been remarked by several scientific observers that hen birds of various species, but more particularly hen pheasants, put on, under certain circumstances, the plumage of the male. The celebrated physiologist, Mr. John Hunter, in his work on the 'Animal Economy,' is of the opinion that 'this change of character takes place in an advanced age of the animal's life, and does not grow up with it from the beginning.' Mr. Butler expresses a similar opinion still more strongly—namely, that 'all hen pheasants, as well as common fowls, would assume the plumage of the cock, to a certain degree, if they were kept to a certain age.'—Mem. Werner Soc. rol. III). Though this, however, to some extent, may be true, the reasons, or rather the accompanying circumstances and changes of constitution, were first pointed out, it is believed by Mr. Yarrell, who seems to have determined that the change of color depends on disease or the removal of the ovarium of the fowl. Among seven hen pheasants, whose plumage more or less resembled that of the male, he found the organ in question diseased, with some variation as to extent, and the progress of change observable in the plumage bore a corresponding analogy. At the commencement of this internal disease, the plumage does not seem to be affected for 'hen pheasants in confinement, and females of the common fowl in the poultry yard, had been known to have ceased producing eggs two years before and change was observed in their plumage.' "

We have yet other modern works to notice, and must, therefore, defer our concluding remarks to a future issue. —Poultry, England.

BUFF LEGHORNS AT THE WORLD'S FAIR.

By Aug. D. Arnold, Dillsburg, Pa.



We should like to impress on the minds of all lovers of the Buff Leghorn the fact that what the breeders of this variety shall do and how they shall do it at the great St. Louis show as regards their exhibit of this variety of Leghorn, will have much to do with the future welfare of the breed. There is no doubt that the poultry department at St. Louis will be in extent the greatest and grandest ever seen in the world. And it is the duty of the Buff Leghorn breeders to get their share of good work in. No doubt breeders of other varieties of Leghorns will do their share, and if we are not careful we shall come out in the rear. No poor specimens will be shown, but every first class bird will find its way to St. Louis. A poor specimen in a show room does the breed it represents harm. The advertising one gets at this show will be far-reaching, and will go around the globe. And if the exhibit shall be one of extra quality, it will be a help to any Buff Leghorn breeder, and all will profit by it.

At this writing it is not known who will judge this variety at St. Louis, but we hope it will be a judge who will judge the bird and not the exhibitor, giving the best bird the prize, as far as his honest judgment goes. We would rather show under an incompetent judge that was strictly honest than a competent judge who was dishonest. We think all would stand a better chance for justice. We hope the exhibit of Buff Leghorns at St. Louis will be the largest and best ever seen in the world, and we believe it will.

The Buff Leghorn Club has issued a 44-page book, which will be sent free to any one asking for it, giving information about those egg machines, the Buff Leghorns.

A judge cannot listen to outsiders without running the chance of making a mistake. It is safest to rely solely on your first impression. Never rely on anyone else's judgment. When you have examined the specimen thoroughly, if then you have the least doubt, stick by your own impressions, for every time you weaken you injure your own judgment. I do not mean that you should never ask advice, as everyone should be willing to learn. Many times there are specimens so near alike that you are satisfied they tie as near as two specimens may have equal merits in points. Then let the larger bird win; or if the decision is between old and young birds—one being fully grown, the other growing—then the one having a chance to grow into the winning position should win.—J. K. Felch in Southern Fancier.

SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1904.

Mr. John D. Jacquins, Waterviiet, N. Y., has been added to the list of judges at the Johnstown show to be held November next. This will be his debut in the role of judge, but "Jacq" has been a breeder of thoroughbred fowls many years and has an eye for fine feathers and we are pleased to have him enter the ranks of poultry adjudicators.

As superintendent of poultry at the New York State Fair, Mr. Jacquins will have the pleasure of cooping the birds in the finest equipped building of its kind in America. From what we can learn from the plans, the arrangement of the coops will be something entirely different and will mark an era of progress justly creditable to the Empire State. The front of the coops face the aisles and are of the Empire pattern, but no doors, openings or feed cups are visible. The latter are placed in the back ends facing the feeding and judging aisles. The latter are closed by a gate and only accessible to the superintendent, his helpers and the judges. This insures absolute safety in showing exhibits and prevents the handling of birds by outsiders and all others except the rightful owners and officials.

The wooden coops used at the State Fair have been purchased by the Empire Cooping Company and are offered for sale at a very low figure. They are in very good order, have been substantially built and will make a cheap investment for agricultural or poultry societies.

The Ivory Soap specials have been withdrawn from the World's Fair St. Louis function and will be divided among the most prominent fanciers shows in the United States and Canada. These handsome and valuable specials are causing keen competition and a far better conditioned lot of the birds than ruled in the past. Announcement as to the distribution of these specials will appear in the American Fancier shortly.

"Uncle George" Harding of Binghamton, N. Y., with his usual quick judgment in discovering new and valuable foods for poultry feeding, has contracted for the entire output of the dried milk food described in our issue of May 28 and is now offering it for sale as Harding's Uncle Sam Granulated Milk for poultry. This concentrated by-product of milk in dry form is claimed to be better than meat scraps, has no offensive odor and can be kept in any climate. It is pure, wholesome and high in protein and albumen. The sample we inspected "filled the bill" completely and we are of the opinion that this new food will be very popular and prove of great value in rearing chickens. The demand promises to be very large, but your "Uncle George" is prepared for all comers. We advise our readers to try this food.

The illustration on our title page is a sketch from life made by Mr. F. L. Sewell, while visiting the English shows in 1892. Cuckoo Dorkings are rarely seen these days and it is doubtful if any specimens exist in the United States or Canada at the present time. Even in England they seem to have dropped out of sight. And yet, from what old Dorking fanciers have told us, the Cuckoo variety of this magnificent race of poultry is exceedingly valuable as producers of eggs and choice tablefowl.

The largest sale, as far as the amounts received for individual birds are concerned, was made recently by George N. Northrup, Raceville, N. Y. Mr. Northrup sold to parties in Germany the following Rose Comb Black Minorcas: One cock, $1,000; one cock, $500; one cock, $200; and sixteen hens, $1,700. The price, $111.11 per pound live weight, Mr. Northrup claims, is higher than he has known any other stock to sell for. Excepting some of the fabulous prices paid in England for Games and Game Bantams in the late Capt. Heaton's time, we are inclined to think Mr. Northrup is correct in his claims.

Chicken thieves are becoming rather bold in the vicinity of Fultonville, N. Y. One night last week they appropriated an entire pen of choice Barred Plymouth Rocks belonging to the veteran fancier, W. A. Fuller. The latter succeeded in tracing the stolen property, and there promises to be a lively time when the matter comes up in court, the accused parties being rather well known in Mayor Wemple's little city. A dose of Allentown, Pa., justice meted out will cure people of the habit of chicken stealing most effectively.

After reading Theodore Hewes' various criticisms on one person in particular and several in general, we would urgently advise him, no matter how much in the right he may be on one or all of these matters, to drop them, for in the language of D. Lincoln Orr, president of the American Poultry Association: "What's the use?" The Spartan is silent, even when the fox gnaws at him.

"How strange it is that you tell a horse's age by a horse's teeth, but a chicken's age by your own."—Poultry Advocate, Canada.

Hardly applicable to the average boarding house chicken, whose age is and always will be unfathomable.

What has become of the Costly Fishing Club? That annual outing in the wilds of the Adirondacks, as planned last winter, seems to have been forgotten. President Cost had better stir up the Shelton trio and get Secretary "Dave" Nichols to call the round-up.

Editor Watmough of the Fanciers' Gazette, England, has a very strong editorial on the qualifications of a poultry judge, in the May 20 issue. The following extract from the above will read just as well on this as on the other side of the big pond:

"The great judges in our law courts are the men that not only possess a complete knowledge of law and equity, but who are so built that they can weigh up with equal justice all sides and phases of the matter before them. There have been law judges, no doubt, with kinks in their minds, just as there may be judges of live stock with distorted minds, but the really great judges had nothing of this sort about them. Their remarkable strength of mind, their freedom from knots, their security from distorted visions, and their ability to weigh up both sides, have only been equalled by their complete knowledge of the law, and their all-governing sense of justice and fair play. All this equally goes towards the making of great judges of live stock, and much of it is indispensible if our adjudicators hope to receive the full confidence and respect of all exhibitors alike. No man should undertake the duties of a judge unless he possesses a full share of the essentialities that obviously go to make a man competent for the post. He ought to thoroughly understand the varieties he essays to judge, and he ought not only to be so constituted by temperament as to be able to weigh up and willing to properly appraise the different points, but he ought to be possessed of the true sportsman's nature—an overwhelming love of fair play, and the desire that the best shall win."

Little need be added to the above, as it covers the ground almost entirely. We have found that our best judges of live stock are invariably great lovers of the stock they handle. They are enthusiasts and while giving preference to some breed or variety simply as a matter of taste, these same men will pass on the merits of all breeds in a fair and impartial manner. The man that hates a certain breed and is prejudiced against it will never do to pass upon its merits. Judges had better look for the good points in all breeds; the bad ones will appear quickly enough on close examination. Hunting for defects, to begin with, is not a very safe plan in valueing a bird. We once noted an almost demoniacal grin on the face of a judge some years ago when he threw out the best Barred Rock in a very hot class at a very large show because there was a wee bit of down on the web between the toes of one foot. Most judges would have hesitated to throw out such a bird.

Editor "Mac" Pierce, in the May Fanciers' Gazette, cuts a melon wide open when he states some plain facts regarding the work of the Revision Committee. It may be necessary during the coming summer to arrive at the exact definition of the word "work." It can be worked into various meanings. Furthermore, it will be in order to find out whether "thinking" is real work or not. It strikes us forcibly that some people measure their work by a rule of their own invention and consequently place a valuation on it not commensurate with its actual performance. The writer has always insisted that the credit for getting up the new Standard should be given to the entire Revision Committee. This in no way dims the lustre of the work of the two members who have for a number of years advocated the illustrated Standard Why all this bickering, quarreling and self-glorification? What's the use?

AS PROLIFIC AS ANY.

Just now the question is, "What breed is best layer?" I suppose the recent Australian experiments have had much to do with stimulating an interest in this question. At any rate, everyone seems to be looking for layers at present, and other qualifications that a hen may or may not possess are seemingly of no importance. Even the breeders of pit games are beginning to consider that without "prolificness" their fowl count for naught. It matters not how handsome, how useful for table purposes, or how well qualified for the show room or pit—all these things availeth naught, unless the laying qualities are present also. I am a breeder of pit games, handling both American and foreign strains, and being in touch, and, I might say, in daily correspondence with the game fancy and cockers generally, I am in a position to state, with some degree of accuracy, I thing, that the game hen's laying qualities are being more and more considered. It was always true that the American game hen rivaled the Spanish and Mediterranean biddy in the annual yield of eggs, but it has never been the custom to class the game with the "laying kinds," and the average breeder of games cared little whether his fowl layed well or not so long as they were otherwise qualified for his purposes. It is different now, or at least it is beginning to be different. It note that nearly every applicant for my stock enquires about the laying qualities of the strains kept. After color, size, carriage and other points, comes the most practical question of all: "Are they good layers?" Sometimes I am obliged to say "no," thought usually I can say "yes" without great hesitation. In my experience the Oriental game kinds are like all Asiatic fowls—given to broodiness. This is true of the Jap, the Aseel, and is more or less true of the Minoshki. The Cornish Indian and the Malay are not of pure Oriental blood and, from the British blood they contain, this everlasting desire to "sit" is somewhat modified. Among the real prolific game fowl are some of the European strains, the pure American strains and most of those from Cuba, Puerto Rico and the other Spanish possessions, these kinds containing as they do principally Spanish blood. Some of the best laying game fowl I have been able to secure were purchased in the southern states, among them some Kentucky "Dominiques," some "Huddlestons," and "Grist Grady," and these, I believe, are equal to any of the so-called "laying breeds." Some small fowl secured at Adjuntas, Puerto Rico, have proven good layers and a strain of Australian pit fowl (imported some years back by a Texas cocker and of which strain I have been breeding a few) has also demonstrated the fact that pit games are not among the unprofitable kinds. A neighbor, whom I supplied with "Dominiques," informs me tnat his flock beats any other breed he has ever kept, his last experiments having been with Spanish (W. F.) and P. Rocks. From 22 hens he has saved 1100 eggs since the middle of January, and two of the hens have each a brood of chicks, two weeks old. A part of his flock (a few old hens kept over) did not begin to lay until some time in March. At the close of the year I will try to give the American Fancier a record of his flock. Why not give a record of my own fowls, you say? Well, I might do it, but from the fact that a part of the season most of my fowls are closely yarded I do not consider that a test would be practicable, no fowl, in my opinion, doing as well in confinement as when given absolute liberty, which mine get only after the breeding season. Two years ago I kept a record of what eggs six pit game pullets layed in one month (May) and notwithstanding that these six females and a cock were kept in a a yard 30 feet square, they laid 146 eggs. A pen of "Warhorse" pullets did nearly as well under similar conditions.

TABASCO SAUCE.

By the Holy Jumping John Peters, where be I?

Sureman in Commercial Poultry is at it Goodness gracious. Pretty soon will forget what our business is.

Wonderful what a big stir a little thing and a little man can do.

Just the tail end of a resolution is making better enemies perhaps for life.

Have we all lost our senses?

Editors are you running a poultry paper or a political campaign mud slinger.

Did you say muddy wavè, Drev.? Downright filth with all the microbes known to science.

I am ashamed of the whole bunch and Mr. Curtis had you any good horse sense, common decency you would have received the olive branch.

Why do you insist on slinging mud?

I was very much interested in an article on page 21, Commercial Poultry May, '04, issue entitled, "The Deadly Parallel." Mr. Curtis have you read it? The Commercial must have a sure man at the helm.

By Way of Japan:—

HOOSIER TOWN, '04.

G. M. C., Esq., Bison City, N. Y.

Dear Sir:—I received your long-looked for letter, but waited so long that its effects are lost. I tried to bury the hatchet and give our advertisers and subscribers a chance for their white alley, but you seem to be so insistent that we should both be asses that I have finally decided to give you a run for your money. (See May issue). Lay on MacDuff, etc. I fully intended to let the past be gone and forgotten, but henceforth I will try to prove that I can be just as foolish as you are.

Respectfully,

T. H.

Well, now there big Theo. has gone and "done it." Change your mind Theo. please do.

Say, Drev., if that blasted Dutchman is going to get off any more of his "things" please send him down a dictionary, a typewriter and a stenographer of the male sex.

What can one expect from Jersey?

I have asked for a six months leave, so I can keep up to the procesion the editors have started.

Say, if you lower the old eagle to such business, I am a quitter right on the spot.

I feel tickled nigh onto death, just think, Hewes quoted some of my squibs.

Good boy Theo. for once your paper had something fit to read that was true, eh?

The man from "Bosting" will get lost in the shuffle. I am afraid the pace is just too fast for him.

Keep the lid on eh! Say, Robby, no one in America would be more pleased than your own self to have another scrap start in the A. P. A.

Sweetie Pierce's paper has arrived ahead of its usual time. Nice editorial W. C. Very nice, just lovely, but why was it not in your April issue, eh?

Some one must have stuck a pin in you. Don't lag behind.

The St, Louis "meetin" will be rather warm maybe. Another chance to make history.

To be serious, I really wonder if Curtis, Hewes, Shurman, Heck, Robinson, Pierce and a few others think they are doing the poultry industry any benefit by using the space they do in slinging mud.

It is a stench in the nostrils of decent men, and we advertisers, breeders and subscribers ought to with draw our patronage and "do it now."

Lets form an anti-mud slinging Press association.

Ah! My dear Editors, you are killing the goose that lays the golden eggs.

It is better by far to be sinned against than to sin.

Wyckoffs letter in Commercial is all right. I take my hat off to E. G.

If that Ivory soap man would send a few carloads to some of the editors to wash-up, it would be better than to get turned down by St. Louis.

I'll send some tabasco sauce to change the taste in their mouth.

About soap. (Ivory is special) Say did you ever realize what a lot of dummies they have in St. Louis. Too bad they are so short sighted. Come Col Mills, wake up and do the right thing by us.

If you do not know what it is just give Tom Orr a free foot and its dollars to doughnuts things will be O. K.

I'll guarantee Tom's doing the right thing or bust, and you can bet he won't bust.

Too many fingers in the pie out there I always thought, and think so yet. Tom Orr ought to have full power coops, spl. prizes and everything pertaining to the show.

I do not like to follow Mr. Round-a-bout critcising without a better plan, so here goes.

Would call the world's fair managers' attention to the following:

Charge $1 per bird. Engage Spratts Patent or some other concern that is in the business, at say 50c per bird, and divide the proceeds pro rata to the winners.

I believe in a $1 entry fee to keep out the "cheap skates."

I believe some of us will need some ready cash to get home.

I believe it will close the traps of Hewes and others.

I believe it fair, honest and equitable.

Col. Mills, forward march! And for heaven's sake, do not be a lobster.

WEST POINT.

BLACK EAST INDIA DUCKS.

This variety is called in Germany Bahia or Smaragd duck, in France, Labrador duck, in England, E. India or Buenos Ayres duck. Her cradle stands in East India, and as one of her first importations into England came from Buenos Ayres, we often find this name used. In general build she comes close to the Mallards, has also many of the breeding peculiarities of the latter. She is a Bantam duck, and for this reason is bred as small as possible. The Belgian duck of this name is a medium sized bird, used for practical purposes, and for this reason fully unfit to compete against the real small article in shows.

The East India duck, of America, is an ornamental duck pure and simple, and fully unlike the profit producing East Indias of the Dutch.

Plumage must be black throughout and bear a green metallic sheen over the entire surface. Age is generally accompanied with white in plumage, mainly on head, neck and breast. For breding, these birds are as good, if not better, than younger specimens, full black throughout.

Our standard should not disqualify for white, a severe cut would do the breed more good. Disqualify for red brown in breast, this is foreign to the breed.

The bill of the drake should be black, breast slate colored, free from green spots. Drake's bill is black throughout. The duck is a good sitter and mother, will lay 3 or 4 batches of about 12 eggs each in a season, and the last eggs of a cluster, are light colored and green. This color is only superficial and with a careful washing of all eggs will be made pure white, of course this ablution opens the pores of the shell, destroys the fat covering and impairs the vitality of the germ. One drake should not be made to more than 2 ducks, and all eggs will be found strongly fertile.

East Indias are open country ducks, good flyers, and born to road the meadows and streams for their daily ration.—Theo. P. Jager.

Mr. Howell, associate editor of The American Fancier, will furnish weekly reports on the egg and poultry market, and answer all questions submitted to him relating to commercial and practical poultry keeping. When replies are requested to be sent by letter, stamps must be enclosed and letters addressed to George E. Howell, 70 Christopher St., New York City.

Eggs.—Receipts a little over 100,000 cases. Market seems unable to carry the continued heavy shipments at prices quoted, and many sales are being made below quotations, with receipts running away above those of last season, in order to keep a cleaned up market, two things must happen; either more eggs have to be consumed, or they must be stored, an advance of one cent at the wind-up would imply that storing has been the rule. Fancy white eggs quoted at 21c, but hard to get it. Mixed colors, same quality, 18½c; western, 17 to 18c.; southern and Kentucky, 12 to 15½c; dirties, 11 to 14c per dozen.

Poultry.—Receipts for week only 24 cars live and 7,000 packages dressed; result a buoyant market and prices ruled better than for the past several weeks. Live chickens from northern points, 25c per lb.; southern, 20 to 25c.; fowls, western, 14c.; turkeys, 12c.; western ducks, 80 to 90 cents per pair; pigeons, 40c. per pair. Dressed broilers, fancy, nearby points, 30 to 40c.; under 4 lb. to the pair, fowls, fancy western, dry picked or scalded, 13½c. per lb. Spring ducks, state Penn.,, Virginia or Jersey, 19c.; chickens, soft meated for roasting, 16 to 17c per lb; capons, 20c per lb.

One of our upper 3rd ave. citizens advertised recently for "last year's chickens." Must desire to propagate that variety of fried chicken common on the East Side with a resisting force akin to made over rubber, and a tenacity of purpose not to be found in any other brand of chicken meat.

But for toughness, that goose story of Drev.'s makes all my little tales appear like marked down prices on damaged goods. All the while I was in Johnstown, Frank Randall, Jay Quilhot or some other chicken cranks, when not talking chicken, was prating on the rugged benefits to one's health the lime-permeated ozone arising from the leather bleacheries was, it has been ten years since I got away, and it seems the Editor has not only been fortifying his health in all that time, but his nerve as well, it takes nerve to stand sponsor for goose-stories.

Speaking of the Johnstown Fanciers, I am indebted to every one of them. Ten years has dimmed none of the memories of the hearty welcome I received from them all, without throwing any bouquets, and I think those who have exhibited at the Johnstown shows will bear me out, Fulton county is about the best place in the United States for a chicken fancier to drop into.

With the passing of Decoration day, the spring campaign in the poultry business can be said to be over. Here's hoping every reader of the American Fancier has been blessed with an abundant success, and has a good string of birds started on the road to maturity.

Summer chickens are now in order, and many a good bird has been hatched in June, too.

Until further notice, egg shippers will please send by express or refrigerator freight, or else furnish their own brooders.

What's the use? An appropriate quotation for a lot of things pertaining to poultry keeping. For instance, what's the use of trying to rear two hundred chicks in an area where one hundred would tax its capacity to the utmost. Better one healthy, growthy chick than two stunted ones. Or, what's the use of breeding from three indifferent pens when you have just enough good birds to make up one crack-a-jack pen? Again, what's the use of showing two breeding pens with the strongest birds divided in each, thereby losing both prizes, when the five best in one pen might prove invincible. Just ponder on these remarks while at leisure, and tell me, reader, what's the use?

Chicken rearing, to become profitable to the owner, consists of a steady march toward maturity, an amount of food and care which allows a chicken to draw the breath of life, but make no gain, is time and money wasted. If a philosophical view is taken of the situation, on the ground of enjoyment to the owner in caring for his flock, let me add, there can be no enjoyment, as nothing is accomplished.

A dead louse is worth two live ones to any chicken man.

I saw it stated in a government report, experiments have proved the quail to be one of our most valuable birds to agriculture. Living in the winter principally on the seeds of noxious weeds, and in the summer on the bugs and bettles that invest vegitation, the worst on the list being the potato and Mexican cotton bettles, the latter alone destroying more than a million dollars' worth of cotton yearly. Let every fancier drop pheasant rearing, a bird that has proved to be a nuisance, and take up the quail. At the same time try to secure a law as stringent to protect them as the pheasant now enjoys.

CALL DUCKS.

The Call ducks. in German Lock Ente, in France, Canard mignon, come in two colors, gray, like the Mallards, and pure white.

Old English breeders call the gray Aylesbury-Bantams, and the white Rouen-Bantams. Smallness is their great feature.

The duck is a good mother, and should she be allowed at all times to do this important work, she will raise the ducklings, if cold water to puddle in is denied them for the first six weeks of their life.

Call ducks are ornamental ducks, used only at times for calling wild ducks down to places, where concealed hunters are eagerly pointing their guns to bag them.

If the drake is separated from the duck, the latter will long and loudly quack for her lord and master, and this characteristic is used by the gunning fraternity to lure passing flocks of wild ducks down.

THE YARDS.

The yards to most poultry houses are at the south, or sheltered sides of the buildings, to afford protection during late fall and early spring, when cold winds are common. The north house has yards on both north and south sides with convenient gates. The south yards are used until the cold winds are over in spring, when they will go to the north yards, which are well set in grass sod. With the new curtain front south house the yards are to be on the north side only. The birds will be kept in the building until the weather is suitable for opening the small doors in the rear wall. The necessity for getting them out from the open front house, where they are really subject to most of the out of door conditions during the day time, is not so great as when they are confined in close houses, with walls and glass windows. The use of the rear yards only may not prove satisfactory. If, however, as good yields of eggs and health of birds result, many decided advantages will be obtained by dispensing with front yards. The clear open front of the house allows teams to pass close to the open door of the pens for cleaning out worn material, and delivering new bedding, and also in allowing attendants to enter and leave all pens from the outside walk, and reach the feed roof without passing through intervening pens.

TRAP NESTS.

The nest which we use is original with us. It is very simple, inexpensive, easy to attend and certain in its action. It is a box-like structure without front end or cover, 28 inches long, 13 inches wide and 16 inches deep, inside measure. A division board with a circular opening 7½ inches in diameter is placed across the box, 12 inches from the rear end and 15 inches from the front end. The rear section is the nest proper. Instead of a close made door at the entrance, a light frame of 1 by 1½ inch stuff is covered with wire netting of one inch mesh. The door is 10 inches wide by 10 inches high, and does not fill the entire entrance, a space of two inches being left at the bottom, and one inch at the top, with a good margin at each side, to avoid friction. It is hinged at the top and opens up into the box. The hinges are placed on the front of the door rather than at the center or rear, the better to secure complete closing action. The trap consists of one piece of stiff wire about three-sixteenths of an inch in diameter and 22 inches long. This piece of wire is shaped so that a section of it, 11 inches long, rests directly across the circular opening in the division board and is held in place by two clamps, one on either side of the circular opening. The clamps fit loosely and the slots are long enough to allow the wire to work up and down about three inches, without much friction. The next section of the wire is eight inches long and it is bent so that it is at right angles with the eleven inch section. It passed along the side of the box eleven inches above the floor, back toward the entrance door and is fastened strongly to the wall by staples, but yet loosely enough so that the wire can roll easily. The remaining section of the wire, which is three inches long, is bent toward the center of the box, with an upward inclination, so that it supports the door when it is open and rests upon it. The end of the wire is turned over smoothly, forming a notch into which the door may slip when opened.

As the hen passes in under the open door and then through the circular opening to the nest, she raises herself so that her keel may pass over the lower part of the division board, and her back presses against the horizontal wire, as she passes it, and lifts it enough, so that the end supporting the door slides from under it, and the door swings down and passes a wire spring, near the bottom of the box, at the entrance, which locks it and prevents the hen from escaping, and others from entering it.

A Worthy Gem

The Gem Incubator has established its intrinsic worth by its wonderful hatching qualities in the hands of hundreds of poultry raisers. "It is certainly a gem" is an expression heard wherever a Gem Incubator or Brooder is in use. Not a high priced hatcher (costs much less than most others) but a high per cent hatcher. Has many features not equaled in any other machine. Send for new, free catalogue.

The double box with nest in rear is necessary, as when a hen has laid and desires to leave the nest, she steps out into the front space and remains there, generally trying to escape, until she is released. With one section only she would be very likely to crush her egg by stepping upon it and learn the pernicious habit of egg-eating.

The boxes are placed four in a block, and slide in and out like drawers and can be carried away for cleansing when necessary. Four nests in a pen have accommodated 20 hens, by the attendant going through the pens once an hour, or a little oftener, during the part of the day when the hens are busiest. Earlier and later in the day his visits have not been so frequent. To remove a hen, the nest is pulled part way out and as it has no cover, she is readily lifted up, and the number on her leg band is noted on the record sheet, that is tacked up close at hand. After having been taken off a time they do not object to being handled, the most of them remaining quiet, apparently expecting tobe picked up.

Before commencing the use of trap nests, it was thought that some hens might be irritated by the trapping operation and object to the noise incident to it, but we have not found an individual that appeared to be annoyed by it, and we have used Leghorns, Brahmas, Wyandottes and Plymouth Rocks. The amount of time required in caring for the trap nests, so far as our work goes, can only be estimated, as the time varies from one day to another, and having only fifty-two nests in operation, the attendant's time was divided with other duties. By noting the total time used per day in caring for the nests, when the hens were laying most heavily, it is believed that one active person devoting his entire time to trap nests, like ours, would take cars of 400 to 500 nests would take care of 400 to 500 nests commencing the year's work he would need assistance in banding the birds, but after that was done he would care for the nests without assistance until midsummer when the egg yields would probably be diminished and a part of his time could be spared for other duties.

One of the first difficulties encountered was with the leg bands. We procured and used all of the bands that appeared to be durable, and not likely to be lost off. Several kinds were easily put on but would last only a few weeks or months before they would be loosening or breaking, and we finally adopted a make, that consists of a fairly broad metallic band encircling the leg, with the ends held together by small brass spring rings. These rings would sometimes get broken or lost out and we put in two instead of one. Even then, when hens were moulting, broody, or for other reasons not frequently handled and the rings examined, the bands would sacetimes get off. Bands with duplicate numbers and double rings are now used on both legs and the likelihood of losing the identity of a bird is small.

When not using trap nests, the following is a very satisfactory nest. It is a foot wide, a foot high and three feet long with cover. A partition in the middle has an opening just large enough to admit the passage of a hen. The nest openings are away from the light and when a hen goes to the nest and looks in she blocks the opening and shuts out the light and does not see the eggs plainly. The temptation to meddle and break them is thus removed.

FEEDING THE HENS.

For twenty-one years we have been at work with the same family of Barred Plymouth Rocks and have learned one way to feed and handle them to secure eggs, and to avoid the losses which are so common to mature hens of that breed, from over fatness. Other methods of feedings may be as good or even better. While it is true that only the full fed hen can lay to the limit of her capacity, it is equally true that full feeding of Plymouth Rocks, unless correctly done, results disastrously.

Years ago the "morning mash," which was regarded as necessary to "warm up the cold hen," so she could lay that day, was given up and it was fed at night. The birds are fed throughout the year daily as follows: Each pen of twenty-two receives one pint of wheat in the deep litter early in the morning. At 9:30 a. m. one-half pine of oats is fed to them in the same way. At 1 p. m. one-half pint of cracked corn is given in the litter as before. At 3 p. m. in winter and 4 p. m. in summer they are given all the mash they will eat clean in an hour. The mash is made of the following mixture of meals: 200 lbs. wheat bran; 100 lbs. corn meal; 100 lbs. wheat middling; 100 lbs. linseed meal; 100 lbs. gluten meal; 100 lbs. beef scrap. The mash contains one-fourth of its bulk of clover leaves and heads, obtained from the feeding floor in the cattle barn. The clover is covered with hot water and allowed to stand for three or four hours. The mash is made quite dry, and rubbed down with the clover in mixing, so that the pieces of clover are separated and covered with the meal. Cracked bone, oyster shell, clean grit and water are before them all of the time. Two large mangolds are fed to the birds in each pen daily in winter. They are struck on to large nails which are partly driven into the wall, a foot and a half above the floor. Very, few soft shelled eggs are laid and, so far as known, not an egg has been eaten by the hens during the last five years.

We are testing another method of feeding with several pens of hens this year. It consists of the morning, 9:30 a. m., and 1 p. m. feedings of dry food in the litter as usual, but instead of the mash at 3 p. m. all the dry cracked corn they will eat is given in troughs. Beef scrap is kept before the birds at all times, in elevated troughs where they cannot waste it. They are supplied with grit, oyster shell, bone, and mangolds. Dry clover leaves and chaff are given them on the floor each day. One pen of 30 hens were fed through last year in this way with good results, and 150 hens are being fed on the dry food, through this year, in comparison with a like number of their mates that are having mash at the 3 p. m. feeding, as usual with us.

BANTAM FACTS.

The Bantam fancy forms an important part of the poultry industry and is rapidly increasing in extent from year to year.

They fit into a groove which no other fowl could occupy and for this reason it is very unlikely that they will ever suffer through retrogression. There must be reasons for this popularity and I am going to briefly enumerate a few of them.

Who among fanciers does not admire the graceful carriage of a game or the lordly bearing of a cochin as they strut around among their wives? They are pigmies with every attribute of the larger fowl.

The space necessary for a pen of bantams is small indeed and they are for that reason extremely popular with those who live in cities whose yards are of necessity small.

They are, proportionately, very small eaters and on this account desirable when wheat costs $1.15 per bushel and all other grains are at a correspondingly high figure.

The Bantam has been long renowned for its superior qualities as a sitter and mother and is invariably used in hatching and raising Pheasants, Grouse, Quail, etc., when incubators and large hens would be worse than useless.

Their eggs are much larger, in proportion to the size of the bird, than those of large or standard fowls, and the quality is also finer.

They can be kept on lawns and in gardens, where they often equal their value in the insects they destroy, without fear of their injuring seeds and plants, this being especially true of the Cochin varieties.

One sometimes hears the remark that "most anyone can breed Bantams successfully." Such a statement is usually made through ignorance, because it requires fully as much skill (and sometimes a little more) to produce an exhibition bantam as it does for any of the larger varieties of poultry.

Sir John Seabright was occupied many years in the most painstaking and careful efforts to improve the bantam which has since borne his name, and at the present time there are but very few fine specimens of that variety produced each year by its many admirers—showing therefore that bantams are not produced by the same methods as pins are, anyway—nor are the yards of any one individual filled with Madison Square winners. It is therefore reasonable to assert that it requires considerable grey matter to breed good bantams.

The increase in the number of Bantam fanciers has been remarkable, and they are beingtaken up by a great number of the foremost fanciers in the world—the kind of men who do not believe in a mushroom existence for anything they handle.

The National Bantam Association has been an extremely important factor in this increase of bantam popularity. It is composed of nearly every bantam breeder of importance in the United States, Canada, also a number in England. It wields a powerful influence toward the further improvement of all varieties of bantams. Its membership is not made up of dead-wood, but it consists of a body of thorough fanciers whose time and money are at the service of each other in improving their favorites.

It is without doubt the liveliest of any specialty club in America and its benefits and privileges are within the reach of everyone. MATNAB.

SPECIAL CASH PRIZES OFFERED BY THE STATE OF MISSOURI AT ST. LOUIS.

The state of Missouri, through its commissioners, offer to the poultry, pigeon and pet stock fanciers of the state the following cash prizes. Only Missouri exhibitors can compete for these prizes. The rules and regulations of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, will as far as practicable, also be the rule and guide for the awarding of these prizes. It should be remembered that these prizes are offered in addition to any and all World's Fair prizes; that any Missouri exhibitor failing to win a World's Fair prize may still win these Missouri prizes; in short, Missouri exhibitors will compete against each other only for the Missouri prizes, and yet at the same time they will compete with the world for the World's Fair prizes. The state of Missouri has been liberal in recognizing the poultry, pigeon and pet stock interests in such a substantial manner, and it is hoped that the fanciers of the state will appreciate this, by making extra efforts in showing quality as well as quantity.

NOTES ON HAMBURGHS.

As an effort is being made to again give to the beautiful and useful Hamburgh that vogue which it once had, and as, moreover, it is long since any notes on the breed have appeared in the columns of "Poultry," the following may not be inapposite:—

There is scarcely any need to enter into the origin or history of the Hamburgh, since it is fairly well understood that although the breed came to this country from Hamburgh it originated in Turkey; just as, I might mention, Hamburgh grapes were bought by us at Hamburgh, hence the name, although originally they came from Spain. The fowl must, however, have been imported many years ago, for mention is made of it in a work that was written in the fourteenth century.

THE BLACK.

Perhaps the most popular variety at present is the black, which has been bred in England with great care and much success for many years, especially in Lancashire and Yorkshire, and almost a century before the Crystal Palace shows came into existence. This variety was generally known in the old days as the Black Pheasant fowl and specimens were exhibited at village competitions, where the prizes were in kind, copper kettles and such-like useful articles generally figuring in the lists.

From a utility standpoint the black is by no means to be despised; in fact, it is a variety that will give splendid results in a town back-yard, and I, for many years, kept some specimens at a good profit in a suburban garden within a few miles of the heart of the City of London. They are great layers of pure white eggs, which are somewhat larger than those laid by other branches of the Hamburgh family, being, indeed, very similar to those of the black Minorca. The black may not lay quite so frequently as the other Hamburghs, but this is more than compensated for by the weights of its eggs.

The chickens when first hatched are white from the throat to the underpart of the body, the rest being black. They do not usually become thoroughly black until they get their second plumage. When fully grown they are the largest of the Hamburghs, and they make capital table fowls, for though they are less than some other breeds, their bones are smaller in proportion, which their flesh is tender and well-flavored. They are small eaters, and very industrious.

As to exhibition points. The shape and general characteristics should be alike in all Hamburghs, the color of plumage only differing. The best blacks have a rich, satiny, green-black plumage, which glances and glows in the sunlight in a manner peculiarly its own, and specially should this be noticed on the sickle feathers and tail coverts. In former times it was the aim to keep the color a purple-black resembling that of the Raven in his natural habitat; but for the present exhibition arena any approach to bronze or purple tinge should be avoided.

It is well that the black has not yet been spoilt by the craze for exaggerated points. At a recent show I noticed the melancholy aspect of a black Spanish cock, with his heavy napkin-looking appendages, and he seemed grateful when I relieved him of his load by lifting it up and sustaining the weight upon my hand. With a feeling of pity for him, I turned to the Hamburghs. What a contrast! I was at once in a lively and happy company. Their rose combs, brilliant carmine faces, white kid-glove-like ear lobes, lustrous plumage and general vivacity were very striking.

THE SPANGLES.

There are two spangled varieties, the silver and the gold, the principal differences between them being that the silver has a pure white ground color, while that of the gold is a bright bay. Generally speaking, the silvers of the present day are of somewhat larger size than the golds, although personally I consider the latter variety truer to type than the silver.

Spangled have flourished from time immemorial in Lancashire and Yorkshire, and an observant person traveling in those counties by rail may often see them in the drying or bleaching paddocks of the small manufacturers; or, if driving, may generally see them on the village green. It need hardly be said that in these circumstances of a free grass range they are seen to the best advantage. They were locally known as Gold and Silver Pheasant fowls, from the resemblance of their spangled feathers to those of the cock pheasant. In many parts of Lancashire they were called the Moony fowl, from the moon-like shape of their spangles.

Prior to the poultry show era the Lancashire Moony hen was brought to great perfection, but constant breeding for feather produced cocks which were marked much like the hens, and had square or hen tails. These hen-feathered cocks about fifty years ago were thrown out by several judges on the ground of being unprolific.

In Yorkshire another breed was kept which had the cock-feathering, though somewhat inferior in the size and color of their spangles. These were shown alongside the Lancashire Moony hens, and therefore to breed prize-winners two varieties had to be kept and bred separately. By degrees the two breeds eventually became amalgamated, the result being the fowl as at present shown.

The eggs are of average size, and there are plenty of them, no breed excelling this in laying properties, and the eggs are seldom unfruitful. The little chicks are white or buff colored, according to their being silver or gold, with a few black marking about their heads. They are easily reared, and reach maturity tolerably early if well taken care of, and lay when five or six months old.

Tastes differ, but of the two varieties most people prefer the gold, the extreme brilliancy of the feather and rich combination of glossy hues having had many encomiums passed upon them. To quote the words of the original "Poultry Book," published fifty years ago, "Their plumage is compact and close, and in good specimens of the female bird attain a depth of tone seldom surpassed throughout the poultry yard. The only comparison that does it justice may be found in the bloom of a thoroughbred bay horse in racing condition."

THE PENCILS.

In my opinion the pencilled varieties are the most charming of all the Hamburgh family. They are of two kinds—the silver having a white ground, and the gold a rich, gold-colored ground—the markings in each variety being almost identical. As I am writing more especially for amateurs who, like myself, live near London, it may be taken for granted that my preference is for the gold. Did I live in the country, away from the smoke of the town, my predilection might be different.

As to the eggs, they are rather under than over the medium size, but they are produced in quantity. I have had a pen of five hens, which, commencing shortly after Christmas, laid regularly three or four eggs daily. Being non-sitters they seemed to waste no time, and laid almost continuously up to October. Indeed, their old-fashioned name was "Everlastings," and "Dutch everyday layers." They were also known as Bolton Greys and Bolton Bays from the town of Bolton, where they were long favorites and extensively bred. The silver has, too, been referred to as the Creole and Creel (the latter is only a certain local pronunciation of Creole), from the intermixture of the black and white; and the Chitteprat, the derivation of which is not so obvious.

When hatched the silver chickens are a very pale buff color, the gold being considerably darker. They have a few black spots about the head, and show the pencilling in their first feathers, pullets and cockerels being marked alike.

The neck hackle of the hen should be free from pencilling but the rest of the body feathers should be distinctly marked or pencilled straight across with bars of black, and this marking should extend even to the tips of the tail.

The silver cock should be nearly all white, the tips of the wings and tail excepted, which are black. The sickle feathers of the tail, however, should be green-black edged with a white fringe throughout their length, not marbled or splashed. The color of the gold cock used to be a light vandyke brown; but golds are now bred much darker and richer, approaching the color of maroon velvet. The tips of the wings and fluff of the thighs are also marked with black. The tail should not be bronzed all over, but be a rich black, and the sickle feathers and hangers edged throughout with a rich brown or bronze.

OTHER VARIETIES.

Among the more recent varieties, and those, too, which have been produced from the above, are the white, the buff, the brown, and the barred, the former two being included in the standards of perfection issued by the Poultry Club. The white, however, could not compete with the black as regards contrast, and it never became popular; a few may still exist in this country, but they are rarely if ever seen in the exhibition pen.

Buffs have been mentioned, but I have not seen any. Mr. Chas. Holt once told me that he had plenty of perfect buff pullets, but tails and everything, but he was not going to introduce them to the public until he had about five hundred! I believe he was also at the time (1897) endeavoring to produce the brown, but as neither of these varieties has entered the exhibition arena I presume they were unsatisfactory. On one occasion, and one only, I did find a barred Hamburgh exhibited at one of the big shows of the year—at Liverpool, I believe, three or four years ago, maybe longer—but it appears not to have found supporters sufficient to warrant its being bred and shown to any extent, for the barred, I believe, does not now exist.

I will not describe what I consider to be a typical Hamburgh. The bearing of the bird should be sprightly, and its contour graceful, the body of medium length, the wings tightly

Sole Manufacturer and Owner of the MODEL Incubators and Brooders

I am the owner of the above Trade Mark, and if it is on the incubator or brooder you purchase, it is a guarantee that you are getting the latest development of my skill and experience, and also a better machine than I have ever built before. They are not the "Cyphers" by name, but the "Model." Please do not get the two machines confused. Send for free catalogue. Note the new testimonials each month:

NORTHFIELD WHITE LEGHORN RANGE. BAKERSVILLE, N. J., Mar. 31, 1904.

Dear Sir: When I renewed my lease of the Haddon Hall Poultry Farm I started up your Model Incubator. The cellar was very cold, and none of my old Cyphers Incubators would hold up the temperature. Your new machine hatched from 100 eggs every fertile egg, and the chicks all lived. The second hatch has just come off; every fertile egg was hatched, and chicks are strong and active. Your new machine is much better than the "Cyphers." Yours very truly, H. M. BURR.

J. B. HADAWAY.

No. 696 N. Main St., Brockton, Mass.

tucked, and the breast well rounded, avoiding on the one hand the thin, stilted appearance of the Spanish, and on the other the heavy, square build of the Dorking. The head should be neat, the beak horn-colored, short, and stout, and the eyes red, well open, and keen. The comb is one of the most important points, for without a good comb a Hamburgh does not look very attractive. It is of the rose type, and should be full of work or points, level on top, square fronted, and tapering to a long, straight point or leader.

The ears or lobes should be of white kid-glove-like texture, perfectly round and flat, fitting well to the face, inclined to be convex and not concave, and of good size, though not so big as to cause a tendency to white in face. The face itself should be smooth, and the wattles thin, round, and free from creases and "pimples." The comb, face, and wattles should be of a brilliant carmine color.

The hackles should be full and long, reaching well to the shoulders, and placed on a nicely arched neck. The tail should form a perfect circle, and have a nice sweep, and it should leave the body at about an angle of forty-five degrees, avoiding a low carriage, which gives the bird the appearance of lacking spirit; the feathers should be broad and plentiful. The thighs and shanks should be of medium length, requisite to give the bird a bold bearing, slender, and well rounded, flat shins being objectionable. The toes should be fine and well spread, and these and the shanks of a leaden blue color and cleanly scaled. The hens should weigh between 4lb and 5lb, and the cocks 7lb and 8lb. The plumage in both sexes should be tight and close, more of the Game type than that of the Cochin.

If my description of these beautiful fowls should in any measure be the means of the breed becoming more popular, especially in the south of England, I shall feel most gratified. The maintenance of that popularity may be left to their merits and to the specialist club.—Breeder in Poultry, England.

CAYUGA DUCKS.

I have been a breeder of these noble birds for 31 years. Have shown them since 1871, the first show that had them was Farmersville, N. Y., when the standard called for a full white breast free from a mottled appearance. The demands for a white breast at that time are the causes why we get frequently a bird that is not entirely free from white on neck or breast. Let us persevere, however, and we will get the breed to what it now should be, a glossy all-black-bird, that is a joy forever if the sunlight plays on its green sheen.

The wild Cayugas stop in this section, when they return in the fall from the North, and in the spring again when returning from the sunny South, they remain with us for about the same length of time, feeding on bugs and grasses that abount in the adjoining fields. The wild birds are, of course, much smaller. They have a smutty black appearance, very long gracemul neck, short legs, and the drake has a green bill, the same as we often fine in the tame variety. Now the majority desire black bills for both drakes and ducks.—Clarence W. King, Romulus, N. Y.

BARRED AND BUFF ROCKS.

I have won the past season at the following shows: Fitchburg, Mass., Stamford, Conn., South Framingham, Mass., Manchester, N. H., New Bedford, Mass. The above Barred Cockerels were all sired by 3d cockerel, 1903, Madison Square Garden, New York winner, 63 cockerels in this class. Reliable Poultry Journal February, 1903, liked this cockerel above all others in the show. I have a few cockerels sired by above cockerel for sale from $4.00 upwards. Standard weight of very even color, barred well all over. If you want to improve your blood these cockerels are what you want. Money returned if birds don't suit you. I have had my pens mated up by one of the leading Poultry Judges in America—4 pens headed by high scoring cockerels. I have also one pen of Buff Rocks. For the cockerel in this pen and two pullets I gave Mr. Higgins, of Orange, Mass., $75. I have not many sittings to dispose of therefore have your orders booked early. My eggs will be from same pens as I breed from myself. Choicest Eggs $2.00 a sitting.

GEYER'S SCURVY CURE FOR POULTRY was the first article introduced to the public for this purpose, which has been thoroughly tested in the last ten years by many of our brother fanciers who are willing to say with us that there is no other article on the market like this that can be relied on to do its work properly. It is something that the poultry fancier, who appreciates his fine birds, needs very much. What looks more disgraceful than a fine flock of chickens, many, or all of them, having their legs coated with a thick, hard, scabby crust which is called scurvy? It spoils the appearance of the birds and is very annoying to them. It is also contagious. Here we have a sure cure for this ugly disease. By following the directions we guarantee that it will take off that ugly, hard coat and leave the legs clean and smooth and give them their natural color. It also has no equal for healing sores and frosted combs and wattels. It makes them very bright and red. It is just what the exhibitor wants to prepare his birds for the exhibition room. Some of our customers tell us that they have tried it with good results for weak legs. We only ask you to give it a trial. It is put up in tin boxes. Money must accompany all orders. Price, 25 cents. Address, G. A. Geyer, Florin, Pa. 560tf

MONEY MADE

By Using Geyer's Champion Disinfectant & Vermin Destroyer

There are, in all classes of powders before the public, many calculated for the sure cure of lice and vermin and a dozen other purposes, yet are they reliable, and have they produced the results claimed?

In offering this compound, we offer a powder such as is not before the public, and fills a place that none other can for the purpose intended—a positive, sure disinfectant and destroyer of all vermin that invests either poultry, small animals, those of the barn yard.

It is a perfect destroyer of all disease germs, and produces a healthy odor wherever distributed. It is a sure cure for gapes, in young chicks.

If you are skeptical and don't believe in Powders or compouud because of many worthless ones on the market, we ask, please cast aside your prejudice and give this compound a trial. It is put up in 2 pound boxes. Price 25c. 560tf

VOL. XXII. NO. 562. JOHNSTOWN, NEW YORK, JUNE 11, 1904. PRICE FIVE CENTS.

JUNE HATCHED CHICKS.

Many of the Highest Scoring and Most Vigorous Birds are Hatched in June.

Realizing that the severe winter and backward spring has interfered with the production of early chicks, and necessitated the prolongation of the hatching season, many of your readers no doubt are anxious to know whether it will pay them to hatch during June and how to raise such chicks in case they find it advisable to do so, I will therefore contribute to the columns of the American Fancier some of my experiences in raising late hatched chicks and the value of them.

By way of digression, I will state that many poultrymen, whether raising chicks for market or exhibition purposes, like to have many of them hatched during the late winter months or early spring. Early chicks bring high prices in the market as broilers, and when raised for exhibition purposes such birds are more matured and finished, when exhibited at the early fall shows, which gives them a prospective winning value over those hatched later, however late hatched birds, when exhibited at the later shows in competition with those hatched earlier, often win shows in competition with those hatched earlier, often win many of the most coveted prizes, for the reason that the plumage of many of them has then commenced to deteriorate.

Now, in regard to late hatched chicks, especially those hatched in June, are they profitable? I say most emphatically yes. Such birds make good winter layers, especially the Wyandottes, and (barring the early falls shows) make excellent exhibition specimens for shows held later in the season.

Partridge Wyandotte pullets commence to lay when about six months old, and it is generally conceded that such birds as a rule are in their best condition to show just after having laid their first eggs; therefore, a pullet hatched the 20th day of June should commence to lay about the 20th day of December, at which time she should be in the best condition.

The majority of our largest shows are held during the months of December and January, and late hatch birds have an equal chance of winning in competition with many of these which were hatched much earlier. Last season I hatched chicks as late as the 1st of August, with good results, and it may be of interest to many to know that some of my very best pullets that I raised were hatched the 20th of July, among them being the first prize pullet at North Abington, which show was held the 25th day of December.

The same pullet also too third prize at New York, January 5, and another of the same age and, in fact, out of the same brood, took fifth prize at that show.

BUFF COCHIN BANTAM PULLET.

First at New York and Rochester, 1904. Owned and Bred by John F. Homeyer, Middle Village, L. I., N. Y.

It will be seen that the pullet which won first at North Abington was just five months and five days old when exhibited and the two when shown at New York were just five and one-half months old, weighed exactly standard weight when shipped to the New York show and the third prize pullet had laid her first egg.

The fifth prize pullet then had considerable chicken feathers and was not filled out and finished but was penciled all over with good open penciling, and gave promise of developing into one of the most beautiful birds that I ever raised. The manner in which this bird developed during the following month was something surprising, and had it been hatched June 20, instead of July 20, she would in all probability have been placed much higher at that show. She is today one of my most valued specimens, and lays a large brown, well shaped egg.

I have seventeen pullets that were hatched last July that are up in weight, and all are high scoring birds and as hens some of them, in all probability, will be a trifle over weight next fall when in show condition, which rather discounts the idea of many that late hatched birds are always small and stunted.

One of the first questions naturally asked is how were these birds fed. For the first three weeks they were fed entirely upon Chick Manna, which was fed to them every two hours; for the next three months they were fed upon Cyphers' Chick Food, Cyphers' Beef Scrap and that little swill I had to give them that came from the kitchen. During this period they were fed four times a day. After they were four months old, they were given a mash in the morning, consisting of Cyphers' Chick Food and beef scraps; at noon they were given oats and wheat, and at night they were given wheat and cracked corn. Besides this they were often given cabbage, lettuce and dainty bits of anything that I was able to get which I thought would induce them to grow. There are many reasons why we should recommend the setting of eggs all through the month of June, and especially to those who are just starting in the business of raising poultry. My experience has been that during the month of June eggs as a rule are very fertile, and a large percentage of them hatch, in many instances every egg put under a hen.

Weather conditions during this time of the year are generally such that both eggs and chicks will stand more hardships and neglect than is the case during the early hatching season.

Many of our fanciers who advertise to replace all infertile eggs, occasionally have to replace many that were shipped during the early part of the season even when we know by repeated tests that at least eighty-five per cent of them were fertile. Such conditions prove to my mind that the manner and place where eggs are set (especially early ones) and the way hens set upon them, or the manner in which they may be manipulated in an incubator, combined with weather conditions, causes many poor hatches, which is not only a loss to the fancier to the extent of the infertile eggs returned, but often discourages customers who have had but little, if any, experience in the business.

If an equal number of eggs had been ordered later in the season in all probability more chicks would have been hatched, and both parties would have been better satisfied. It is also a well known fact a larger per cent of the late hatcher chicks are pullets, which is desirable to most purchasers of eggs.

The main question to be considered in raising late hatched chicks is to get them far enough advanced before the cold weather sets in that they will not be stunted thereby. I have proven to my own satisfaction that it can be done, and birds raised to full standard weight from eggs that were set the last days in June.

In many instances thirty-three per cent. of the early hatched chicks die before they are three months old, while it is not an uncommon occurrence for ninety-five per cent. of late hatched chicks to grow to maturity under the management of the same breeder.

In years gone by April and May have generally been the months in which I shipped the greatest number of eggs for hatching, but for reason of the severe winter and late spring I expect my June sales to be the equal of any this season and when we meet at the poultry shows next winter we shall probably learn that many a bird which was hatched from eggs set in June has developed into a first-class specimen and a prize winner.—J. B. Hadaway, Brockton, Mass., President Partridge Wyandotte Club of America.

THE HISTORY OF DOMESTIC FOWLS.

[Concluded from June 4 issue.]

We have now arrived at a still more modern section of our poultry literature; but we regret that we cannot say that it kept pace with the improvement which was so decisive in the objects on which it descants. It is the present decade that has produced anything like authoritative information on the subject.

If anyone wishes for a delightful book about fowls, let him buy, if he can procure it, Ornamental and Domestic poultry, by the late Rev. E. S. Dixon. It is not only readable, but most amusing; full of information relative to the history of all kinds of poultry, whether useful or only ornamental, sparkling with bright sketches, and even the fragments of practical detail are all touched off artistically. Take this as a specimen:—

"Shortly before the time of hatching arrives, the chickens may be heard to chirp and tap against the walls of their shell. Soon a slight fracture is perceived towards the upper end, caused by force from within. The fracture is continued around the top of the egg, which then opens like a lid, and the little bird struggles into daylight. The tapping which is heard, and which opens the prison doors, is caused by the bill of the included chick; the mother has nothing to do with its liberation beyond casting the empty shells out of the nest. At the tip of the bill of every new-hatched chick, on the upper serface, a whitish scale will be observed, about the size of a pin's head, but much harder than the bill itself. Had the beak been tipped with iron to force the shell open, it would not have been a stronger proof of creative design than is this minute speck, which acts as so necessary an instrument. In a few days after birth, when it is no longer wanted, it has disappeared; not by falling off, I believe, which would be a waste of valuable material, but by being absorbed and becoming serviceable in strengthening the bony structure, minute as the portion of earthy substance is. And yet some people direct that, as soon as the chick is hatched, this scale should be forced off with the finger nail, because it is injurious!

"All chicks do not get out so easily, but many require a little assistance. The difficulty is, to know when to give it. They often succeed in making the first breach, but appear unable to batter down their dungeon walls any further. A rash attempt to help them by breaking the shell, particularly in a downward direction towards the smaller end, is often followed by a loss of blood which can ill be spared. It is better to wait awhile and not interfere with any of them, till it is apparent that a part of the brood have been hatched some time, say twelve hours, and that the rest cannot succeed in making their appearance. After such wise delay, it will generally be found that the whole fluid contents of the egg, yolk and all, are taken up into the body of the chick, and the weakness alone prevented its forcing itself out. The causes of such weakness are various; sometimes insufficient warmth, from the hen having sat on too many eggs; sometimes the original feebleness of the vital spark included in the egg, but most frequently staleness of the eggs employed in incubation. The chances of rearing such chicks are small, but if they get over the first twenty-four hours they may be considered as safe. But all the old wives' nostrums to recover them are to be discarded: the merest drop of ale may be a useful stimulant, but an intoxicated chick is liable to sprawl about and have the breath trodden out of its body as a fainting one. Peppercorns, gin, rue, and fifty other ways of doctoring, are to be banished afar, together with their subjects—namely,

All the unaccomplished works of Nature's hand,
Abortive, monstrous, or unkindly mixed,
Embryos, and idiots, eremites, and friars,
Into a Limbo large and broad, since called
The Paradise of Fools, to few unknown.

"The only thing to be done is to take them from the hen till she is settled at night, keeping them in the meanwhile as snug and warm as possible. If a clever, kind, gentle-handed little girl could get a crumb of bread down their throats it would do no harm; but all rough, violent, clumsy manipulation is as bad as the throat-tickling of the hard-fingered hangman. Animal heat will be their greatest restorative. At night let them be quietly slipped under their mother; the next morning they will be either as brisk as the rest, or as flat as pancakes and dried biffins."

Next comes before us Ornamental, Aquatic, and Domestic Fowls and Game Birds, by Mr. J. Nolan, of Bublin, long an amateur breeder and a merchant of the birds concerning which he writes. It as a volume contains much information,but ill-digested and relating more to game than to domestic fowls.

Domestic Fowl; their Natural History, Breeding Rearing, Feeding, and General Management, by Mr. H. D. Richardson, is a very excellent compendium of previously published information. The edition before us was revised by a practical farmer.

Lastly, we have Fowls: a Plain and Familiar Treatise on the Principal Breeds, by the late Mr. John Baily, the so well and favorably known poulterer of Mount Street, Grosvenor Square, London. The little work in our possession is a third edition of his pamphlet on his great pet, "The Dorking Fowl," with the addition of some useful and excellent information relative to other varieties. We have room only for one short extract.

"The real Hambro' fowl is a beautiful bird. There are two sorts, the golden and the silver; then differ in one respect only, the foundation color of one is white, the other yellow; one description will serve for both. They have bright red double combs; clear hackles, either white or yellow; bodies spotted or pencilled all over with black; taper blue legs, and ample tails. Their carriage is gay and proud; their shape, symmetry, and their appearance is altogether indicative of great cheerfulness, and carrying an air of enjoyment, which always prepossesses in their favor.

"The plumage of the cocks differs somewhat from the hens: they are very little speckled, if at all, except while chickens, when the wings and hinder parts are marked, but this seldom lasts after the first moult. In the silver variety the cock is almost white, having sometimes a chestnut patch on the wing, and towards the tail some black spots, but these disappear as he gets older. The tail is invariably black, but the sickle feathers are tinged with a reddish-white, and in the golden cock they are shaded with a rich bronze or copper. The cock of the golden is red all over, and both have well-defined white deaf ears.

"The great virtue and merit of these fowls are, they are prodigious layers, and this is not brought about by any undue feeding, but it is their nature. They are said never to set, and, as a rule, it is true of them; not one in a thousand deviates from it; but when I lived in Davies street, I had one at liberty, she stole a nest in a lumber-room, and brought out a brood of chickens.

"They are excellent guards in the country, for when disturbed in their roosting-place they are the noisiest of the noisy, and nothing but death or liberty will induce them to hold their peace. I think I may say with truth, they lay twice as many eggs as any others.

"In these, as in other breeds, erroneous ideas and names have crept in, sove being correct descriptions of the same fowl under another name, but others being imaginative, so far as real Hambro' fowls are concerned.

"The Bolton Bays and Greys, and Chitteprats, are identical with the Hambro'. I have also seen so-called Turkish and Creoles, which were the same.

"As a general rule, it may be observed, no true-bred Hambro' fowl has top-knot, single comb, white legs, any approach to feather on their legs, white tail, or spotted hackle.

"I know no bird that gains so much by change of climate as this does; the British bred are infinitely better than the imported."

In conclusion, we have to observe that one great deficiency more or less detracts from the value of all the publications we have passed over rapidly in review—they are not original works. They do not place before us facts stored up by the authors or by their friends; but they retail, again and again, what their predecessors had borrowed before, and that without sufficient knowledge to select ancient truths—always valuable—but republishing them with equally ancient errors. Mr. Baily's volume claims exemption from this condemnation, but this very exemption proves the correctness of our judgment. Mr. Baily has confined himself chiefly to a statement of his personal experience and observation, and the result is a duodecimo of fifty-eight pages.

We might proceed to remark further upon the great deficiency of knowledge, often mixed with the practice of gross ignorance, relative to the diseases of fowls, which are markedly apparent in all the volumes we have enumerated; and added to these deficiencies are most imperfect arrangement, and the absence of good facilities to reference. The defects were very extensively felt, and, combined with the wide, and more widely growing, attention paid to poultry, induced several of the best breeders of poultry to contribute the results of their experience, hence the excellent works on the subject we now possess from the pens of Mr. Lewis Wright, Mr. Harrison Weir, Mr. W. B. Tegetmeier, Mr. Edward Brown, Mr. L. C. Verrey, Mr. W. Cook, Mr. R. W. Webster, and others.

Salt must be used very carefully in the food, as too much of it will cause loss, though it will not be harmful, if the food is seasoned slightly with salt, especially when bowel disease has resulted from the use of grass early in the season. Fowls drink freely of water, but the excess is passed off with the solid matter. If they partake of too much salt, they have intense thirst, and cannot drink enough water to dilute the salt properly, and the result is death. Rock salt, and especially that from fish or pork, will be readily eaten by hens sometimes, and for that reason it should never be thrown within their reach.—American Poultry Advocate.

That com. of 3 has played a winning card and scooped the jack pot.

Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that entereth his birds here shall not get mulcted.—Com. of 3.

Now, Theo., will you be quiet?

Say, Drev., I could have twice as much fun with the boys as I do if you would throw away that confounded blue pencil. You just rip it up vigorously sometimes.

Still, it's your paper and you are the editor, so I won't kick.

Tom Rackham will stalk forth and proclaim "Richard is himself once more."

Spratts Patent Tom , Rackham World's Fair. What a combination to ship to. Good boy, Tommy.

Deacon Sparks, dear old soul, World's Fair, cold hearted creature. Never mind, Sparkie, old boy, there are more drops in the clouds.

Jim Glasgow has taxen the flag pole at West Point to train his game bants. Awful reach.

Tom Orr has lost a friend and neighbor, Senator Quay.

He'll lose more after the ball is over.

Say, Tom, how about those judges?

Two shows in New York. Whew? Why not? Plenty of room, plenty of birds and the old reliable Crawford will never know the city ever held that "Nov." show.

I'll bet a World's Fair prize against a cake of Ivory soap that the other N. Y. show will help increase the attendance at the Garden.

More people will become interested.

It will liven up the other fellows, too.

The Japs will take Port Arthur, but the chicken cranks will stick to port wine.

Say, Drev., who's that Dutchman?

Say, Pa, why are some of the poultry judges like a hen?

Why, my son, I don't know. Why are they alike?

Because they are both fow(u)l. (Laughter).

If any of the editors want to get touched up now and then send me their wind bag so I can see what's doin'.

There are times in one's life when one wishes one were dead. G. M. C.

Jaquins is the greatest card that ever came down the pike. Just keep your eye on the N. Y. State show. Plenty of good coops, many thanks, old man.

"Billy" Holmes is going to offer a silver plated, gold-lined, Sewell-etched, Curtis-inspected cup for the best essay on "Dave" Nichols as a cochin judge. Sealed proposals to be sent to Sharp, Baylies & Co., of Bosting.

Do you grasp the idea? If you do it is all right. DeWolf Hopper.

Judge Parker of N. Y. may be nominated for Pres., but Judge Parker of N. J. has Dun-well-on. Well, well, can't do it, no use; lost both ends.

Will there be room enough for Hewes and Steinmesch in St. Louis (or St. Louey, which?)

No rumblings as yet from that com. of 5.

You can catch more flies with molasses than you can with vinegar.

But the poultry editors seem to have an over supply of the latter.

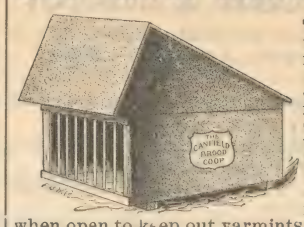
Wonder if Tom Orr will allow the poultry department to be open on Sunday at St. Louey?

One would think that Hewes would take the word "Reliable" from his cover page. Change it, Theo. Make it "useful" information.

Mr. Trafford of Poultry Success needs to be looked after.

By the way, Hank, on page 14, May issue, you say "Mr. Brown's Barred Rocks were winners at Madison Square Garden last winter.

As a matter of fact, that man Brown did not even exhibit at the Garden last winter.



This kind of work ought to stop. It's a downright shame to make such statements. Again it's not fair to the other advertisers who did really win.

I am going to hammer and hammer hard every one who plays such a game.

Be anything, even a clam; but do not be a deceiver. Please, Mr. Henry Trafford, explain in your next.

The Adirondack Poultry and Pet Stock club will hold its summer meeting on Thursday, June 16, at Fultonville, N. Y., the guests of Messrs. Wemple of the Empire Cooping Co. The business meeting will be held at 7:30 o'clock in the evening, after which Chef Eisenmann will dish up some of his famous dishes. The completion of premium list and arrangements for the annual clambake will be the business before the meeting. Prof. B. W. The illustration of a pair of Pouters in the supplement to the May 15 issue of the Pigeon News is the finest piece of work of its kind yet turned out. The artist, Arthur O. Schilling, is to be congratulated. He is "the goods."

The illustration of a Black Langshan cockerel, winner at some of the English shows, which appears in the May 27 issue of our esteemed British contemporary, Poultry, is a "reversal of form," to use a turf expression. Langshan fanciers on this side of the pond would never pick such a typeless fowl to represent, even remotely, the stately Black Langshan of the famous Croad type that has been the standard here. The bird illustrated has a gamey appearance, albeit a very long back that rises in an inclined plane from base of tail to end of neck feathers, long legs and thighs, shallow breast, little depth of body and a gamey tail with narrow, almost straight, sickles. It is what might be termed, "a blooming blasted caricature." It is a pity to destroy the magnificent points of beauty of one of the greatest and most valuable fowls on earth by following the fad of a select coterie of interested and selfish breeders and judges.

The craze over brown eggs has evidently hit our British cousins real hard. Editor Watmough in the Fanciers' Gazette handles this fad as follows:

"Everybody seems to be going crazy over brown eggs. At every breakfast table when the eggs come on there would appear to be a rush for the brown ones. If there happens to be only one brown egg there is as much of a struggle to get hold of it as there is to obtain possession of the ball outside the pack in a good old Rugby game of football. Epicureans, if they can't have a brown egg, will have a shop 'un. Why, oh, why, can't all hens lay brown eggs? At the last meeting of the National Poultry Organization Society, held in London, the minister of agriculture, Lord Onslow, confessed his affection for brown eggs. Moreover, he gave advice to British poultry keepers that we would not have dared to give to fanciers, for fear of being charged with an incitation to faking and fraud. Lord Onslow advised them to meet the competition of foreign artificially brown tinted eggs by coloring white British eggs with coffee. 'There is no doubt that everyone prefers brown eggs,' he said, 'and I frankly admit that when I see four or five eggs on the breakfast table, one of which is brown, I always take that one, although I know its contents are no better than the others.'"

In the cultured Beantown, Mass., there has existed for many years past a similar fondness for brown eggs. How the "brownies" may be obtained Mr. Watmough explains thusly:

"It may now be taken for granted that we shall see far more brown eggs than we have done. A demand invariably creates a supply. If the British public will have brown eggs it will get them. If the hens can't meet the demand the coffee-pot will. There is nothing like having two strings to one's bow, and the fowl house and the coffee-pot would now appear to be a very useful combination."

We doubt very much whether coloring eggs by the coffee process would find favor in the eyes of our evangelistic friend and editor, Mr. Robinson of Farm-Poultry, published in Boston, Mass. The Rhode Island Reds, Barred Rocks and Light Brahmas lay eggs that do not need the assistance of the coffee pot to lend color to the occasion.

This being the Rooseveltian age, why draw the color line? As to eggs "dey is eggs," as the colored swiper of hens' nests remarked. He certainly did not draw the color line in gathering the hen fruit. In New York there is a market that calls for white eggs at fancy prices, so there you are! Which is the best egg the white or the brown? This will make a nice midsummer argument all along the line. We will turn over the discussion to our New York associate, George Eggs Howell, and he can get the warring factions to put their ideas on paper and we will print the opinions on the subject. In order to start the ball rolling, we reprint Editor Watmough's opinion as to what is the real guide to the best egg. He says:

"There is very probably not the slightest difference from a nutritive point of view between the naturally brown colored egg and the white one. The real or the artificial coloring may satisfy the eye, but the proper guide as to the worth of an egg, of course, is to be found inside. There is an important dietetic difference between the yolk of pale yellow and that of a rich, almost reddish color, and no wonder the latter is in such request. Whether we are all so fond of the brown-tinted shell or not, we all plump for the rich, red yolk, and it is this that egg producers ought to go for. Fowls properly fed, and kept on free ranges, have usually this desirable colored yolk, and it is generally the town-kept hens that give us the sickly yellow one. It is, no doubt, the iron compound in the egg which gives color to the yolk, and, therefore, the deeper the color of the yolk, the more nutritious the egg, and the better it is for us. Eggs are, it is needless to say, one of the most perfect and complete foods we possess, and not half enough use is made of them in our dietetic table. It is lamentable, too, that farmers do not make more of their production. Egg production ought to be an important branch of a farmer's business, and yet no part of their work is more indifferently considered or attended to."

Partridge Wyandottes are enjoying great popularity in England. They deserve it. They are among the handsomest and most useful of domesticated fowl and a credit to the American fanciers that originated and improved the breed until it ranks with the best in the whole list. Watch that big Partridge Wyandotte show to be held at Brockton, Mass., next December. It will be a great one.

The following facts regarding the feeding of hemp-seed and other grains are so clearly put forth in the Pigeon News that we reprint them:

"We have read many times that hemp should be fed sparingly, and some go so far as to point out bad results that come from feeding it too freely. The idea is simply a whim handed down by some one who fancied or dreamed that hemp is too heating for pigeons. We have never neard of any breeder who has had practical experience with hemp seed claim it harmed their birds in any way. For the benefit of any who doubt our assertion we will state that a few seasons ago we purchased one ton of hemp seed at three cents per pound and fed it as a steady diet the whole summer to a flock of Homers and Dragoons and never have he had such results before or since. Our squabs were larger, fatter and the percentage of loss much smaller than we have ever known on any other feed. The only objection to hempseed is its cost, and nothing will liven up a flock or make squabs grow, equal to it. This is from one who has tried it and knows, and not from hearsay or read from an old book. On the other hand, we have known a breeder to have the best of results from feeding mostly common oats and whole corn, and the fact is, some breeders do well on one thing, while others do not. The main thing is, feed sound grain no matter what kind and keep the water pure and fresh.

It is not so much "what you feed," but "how you feed."

RECOLLECTIONS OF SOME OF THE RARER BANTAMS.

By Mr. O. E. Cresswell.
President of the Variety Bantam Club.

We take from the Year Book of The Variety Bantam Club, the following:

The subject of this article was suggested to me by our secretary. There is something appropriate in his suggestion, because when our club was founded, the two primary objects which its founders set before themselves were: 1st, to bring as many lovers of Bantams as possible into its ranks; ed, to encourage the culture and exhibition of as many varieties of Bantams as possible. There may, too, be something appropriate in his suggesting this subject to myself, for my recollection of Bantams is now a somewhat long one; my first pair were given to me on my fourth birthday,and I have never since been without some of the Pigmy races.

The love of Bantams, from a fancy point of view, probably dates much further back than we are won to think. The Poultry "Fancy," in modern acceptance of the term, began about the middle of the 19th century. The first importation of Cochins gave a great impetus to it; the extension of Poultry shows still further stimulated it. But there were true lovers of Poultry long before there were poultry shows, who besides cultivating pure races of larger fowls loved their Bantams as interesting exotic pets, and found them useful helps to their keepers as foster mothers for the eggs of pheasants and partridges whose eggs had been cut over by the mowers.

I have two favorite old books which have been suggestive to me of many inmates for my feathered menagerie, which (I almost fear to relate it) is accommodated in some eighty aviaries, houses, and larger or smaller enclosures in my grounds; they are "The Dovecote and Aviary," viz, various essays by the Rev. E. S. Dixon, published collectively under the above title in 1851; and "Ornamental and Domestic Poultry" by the same author, first published in 1848. My copy is of the second edition of 1850. The chapter in it on Bantams is appreciative, but the list of them somewhat meagre. It may surprise some of our members to read in it that "some twenty or thirty years back Bantams would have supplied a more formidable muster than they now do."

To come to something more practical than these historic reminiscences: What were these earlier races of Bantams? The four which I can distinctly remember and roughly describe were (1) Spangled, (2) Nankin ,(3) Partridge—somewhat allied to Nankin, (4) Speckled. There were, of course, also "Booted" Bantams, of which I have little recollection, which were sometimes called "Creepers and Jumpers" from their funny gait, necessitated by heavy foot feather. (1) Spangled Bantams were the commonest variety, which, I believe might now be revived, for I often see in mixed stocks birds which are evidently traceable to them. My own first pair of Bantams were of this type. The cock was of a rich red color in saddle and hackles, not unlike a Black-red Game cock, his breast black and (I think but am not sure) slightly splashed with red; then hen had black, not very regular spangles, on a gold or copper ground. Their combs were single. I have by me now a stuffed hen of this variety of a much earlier date. She was the pet of one of my parents in youth, and must have been stuffed about 70 years ago. She evidently died old, for her tail is slightly grizzled, and there are whitish edges to the spangles. I have always believed that this breed were used in the production of Sebrights. I have been told that lacing is absolutely different to spangling. I do not think so, and have seen waster Sebrights whose markings came very near to spangling. The cocks, too, of this breed never had real sickles.

(2) Nankins. These we fortunately still possess, yet how few are seen or shown. Dixon says of the, "Of late years (i. e. in 1848) they have much gone out of fashion, but deserve to be rescued from utter extermination." I had some in early childhood, and after reading this over thirty years ago set to work to revive a strain. I got birds from two widely different counties, and was fairly successful with them. I think the story of them is in the earlier editions of Wright's "Books of Poultry," but has fallen out of the new edition.

As a description of Nankins I quote from my own article in the old "Book of Poultry," with one or two corrections, which the experience of many additional years suggests. "Their points I consider to be: first, size as small as possible; second, comb single or double—I prefer the latter, but am told that the best Nankins of 30 years ago (i.e., now 60) had single combs; thirds, legs blue, though I have seen birds, otherwise very typical, with white legs. The cock has an amusing and conceited gait, with flowing sickle, tail, and wings almost sweeping the grounds. His breast and body are of a deep ginger color; the back, wing coverts, neck and saddle hackles a rich orange or chestnut; the tail chestnut or copper shading into black. The hen's general color is a clear buff, like that of a good Buff Cochin. In some birds it is of a ginger, in others of a canary hue, with neck hackles as free as possible from dark lacing. The tail shades into black towards the end. The unseen half of the primary wing feathers is often,as well as in the cock, black." Nankins are the most tamable and engaging of Bantams, excellent layers of large eggs for their size, and most careful mothers.

(3) Partridge Bantams bore much the relation to Nankins that Partridge Cochins do to Buff Cochins. I can quite remember the latter two breeds in the earlier days of their importation being sometimes bred together, and I fancy that just the same admixture of Nankins and darker colored or Partridge Bantams often took place. Dixon calls them "a browner variety of the Nankin, and also miniatures of Golden Hamburghs, both pencilled and spangled." I had some in early childhood among my pets, and can distinctly recollect being lifted up to look at a pen—I think, a cock and four hens—at the historic Poultry show in Baker Street.

(4) I can remember frequently seeing Speckled Bantams at farms—the same color as the then Speckled Dorkings, i. e., white, black, and yellow fairly evenly blent in every feather. It is somewhat strange that in those days of the rise of "the Fancy" there should have been Bantams so like an old English breed, for Dorkings have been in this country probably from the days of the Romans, while Bantams are the production of long-ago Asiatic fanciers. Is it possible that some English fanciers of a century or two ago may by judicious crosses have produced dwarfed Dorkings? Unfortunately I have no recollection of the number of their toes.

These, then, are the Bantams which I remember—I was going to write "in the mist of the past," but my recollection of them is by no means hazy.

I come next to a few of the rarer breeds which I have known since. I do not mean the clever productions of quite modern times which we can all see at our greater shows, such as Dark and Light Brahmas, Malays, or old English Game, but breeds which are scarcer and not easily obtainable.

White Whiskered Booted are in few hands—I believe a few years ago they were only to be found in one yard. A great friend of mine, a vice-president formerly of our club, but now no longer living, Mrs. Ricketts, bought the whole stock of a gamekeeper in a Gloucestershire Park, where they certainly had been kept for 30 years. They must have been much inbred, but when in this lady's possession did not seem to me exceptionally delicate. Where they had originally come from we never could trace.

Frizzled Bantams.—About twenty years ago a number of these arrived in this country sent with other Japanese to another good friend of mine, the late Countess of Dartmouth, by a friend residing in Japan. From an exhibitor's point of view, they were a troublesome rarity; some judges disqualified them in the Japanese classes, properly belonging to the A. O. V. class, and others vice versa. I have not seen any for many years, but was reminded of them when judging the Variety Bantams at the last Birmingham show. Some Frizzles then exhibited bore unmistakable traces of relationship to Japanese.

"Tailless" Bantams, or, as they used less euphoniously to be called, "Rumpless" Bantams, were probably long ago a dwarfed variety peculiar to the Isle of Man, where even quadrupeds were prized from exemption from tails! I do not remember seeing them early in life, but I have long possessed some, and now have them, both clean-legged and feather-legged. They are very hardy and funny little things, and are obtainable in many colors. I prefer them speckled black and white all over, or the rich red cocks or golden hen, like tailless miniature Partridge Cochins or Black-red Game, according as they are feathered or clean on the legs. Years ago in the yards of Mrs. Ricketts, I often saw a tailless perfect Silver Sebright; she came as a present from Mr. Garnett, then a renowned Silver Sebright fancier, in whose yards she was reared, an entirely unexplained "lusus naturae." The taillessness of these birds is so strong that a tailless bird mated with any other Bantam is sure to produce some completely tailless offspring.

Many other quaint and pretty pygmies I have seen here and there, but scarcely distinctive enough to describe as breeders. I think the above are all worth perpetuating where they remain, or reviving, if a stray bird can here or there be found, where they have been lost as breeds.

BROODY HENS.

Hens will become broody and how to treat them, so as to have the smallest loss in time is the question. "Breaking up" the nest is one means,but a persistent hen will set beside it, on a bone, a stone, a stick, in fact, on nothing, and it becomes so puzzling that the owner gets out of patience, and beats her, kicks her, drives her off twenty times a day, dips her in water until water soaked and nearly drowned; dogs her, ties strings to her, and resorts to devices which do no good but reduce her in flesh, and thus help to make her less useful than she would otherwise be.

The modes which have proved the best, all things considered, are to place her, after allowing her to set four or five days, in a strange coop with a vigorous male, giving plenty of food and water. Another is to confine her in a coop raised from the floor, with slats for a bottom and feed her well. Another is to allow her to set a few days, and then confine her in a warm and comfortable coop by herself, giving her plenty of feed and water. By these methods she will not get thin in flesh and will show symptoms of naturalness again, having ceased to "cluck" and will begin her singing. This mode will cause the loss of about two weeks only, while the others may result in the loss of a month or six weeks.—Fanciers' Gazette.

What egg producer upon reading of customs practiced by the Danish egg exporters, can be content to allow present methods to continue in practice to the detriment of the industry. I say let us be up and doing; it would be a great thing if the egg crop of this country could be moved by a shorter route. If the egg that is laid this morning could be on the to-morrow's breakfast table, it would be a cause for congratulations among the egg users, the price at the present time is all that could be desired. Why not show a little desire to move the crop more rapidly. Every egg cannot be a topnotcher, for various reasons; and fortunately all classes of people do not think the same, making a demand for all grades, but every effort should be made to reach an early market.

If the time ever comes that the poultry keeping industry is able to market its own product through its own agents, and I do not ever expect to see that time—when the producer will be collector, sorter and shipper, something will then have happened to uplift and upbuild the poultry industry, and place it on a plane not enjoyed by any other branch of rural life.

The storing of eggs is not a curse, only the poultrymen should be the storers. It elevates prices of summer eggs, and puts eggs in the reach of a class of people when they are scarce that otherwise would have to cut them from the bill of fare.

As it stimulates the industry by making the prices obtained attractive, it is a positive benefit to the producer in summer and a blessing to poor and shrunken-pursed in winter.

Now if the producers of eggs were also their own brokers, and the dead ends of trade where regular sinks and cesspools in the egg business form, were cut out and the crop marketed in record breaking time, it would be a great step forward. But as I said, something we shall hardly see in our generation.

Mark you, I am not talking in favor of combination or corner, to restrict the output and harrass the consumer. I am talking about the slowness which the present method allows the crop to be moved, and in favor of improving the quality, thereby stimulating the demand by better goods, for I believe the public is appreciative, and once its confidence is won will consume more eggs and pay the price of the better grades.

I do not believe in extortionate prices, but rather a common regard for the welfare of both producer and consumer.

You ask how can this vast business be handled. I answer in the same way as described in the Denmark method. The Agriculturist and producer deliver the eggs at the station to-day, when they are immediately sorted and graded and shipped to their destination on the first express, let it be near or far. They are started right and upon reaching their market, let them be available to the wants of the housekeeper immediately. Wideawake men to pack and ship them, and live men to distribute them at prices fair to all in the shortest possible space of time.

In looking up the Fluff subject a little for an American Fancier reader, I saw a great future for them among a certain class of fanciers. They certainly will not be a breed of trouble makers; they won't scratch up the garden or go to one's neighbors' to lay; neither will they lead one a half mile chase when chicken is wanted for dinner, for which they will be the limit; but it takes a good length of shank to overrun a forty acre field, for the fancier who believes in plenty of exercise and a free range, the Fluff will be out of it.

If any poultryman desires to push along the chicken industry the columns of the American Fancier are at his disposal. The person who, having accomplished a certain purpose, or discovered a method of treatment, which is an improvement on the custom in vogue, does well to give his neighbor the benefit of it. I am impelled to make this offer on my own responsibility, because the need seems to be urgent. The American Fancier being the only publication not devoting its space to sewage and similar pleasant subjects, of which the average reader cares not a particle. That is my reason for inviting talks on poultry matters.

Now is a good time to perfect that method of ventilation talked about so incessantly last winter. Any system that allows the heat to escape from the highest point in the house. With the windows removed and wire screens in their places, you have done about all in your power. I might add place perches enough so it will not be necessary for them to pack themselves in like sardines in a box.

POULTRY AS INSECT DESTROYERS

There is one valuable advantage of keeping poultry on the farm that is generally overlooked, and that is the vast number of insects destroyed by them. If every insect destroyed by a hen in a day were counted and an estimate made of the number of insects eaten by a flock of twenty-five hens, it would show that the hens are more useful in that respect than may be supposed. When busily at work scratching, the hen secures many grubs and worms, while the larvae of insects also assist in providing food. A flock of turkeys will search every nook and corner of a field for insects, and as a turkey can consume a large amount of food it will make away with a vast number of them each day. The active guinea fowl is ever on the search over the fields for insects. It does not scratch, but every blade of grass is looked over, and it rarely comes up to the barnyard to seek food. Its industry prompts it to secure its own food, and in so doing hundreds of insects are destroyed. The ravenous duck, whose appetite seems never satisfied, will attempt to seek enough in the field, and it captures not only insects, but the field mouse and small reptiles will be eaten if other food is not plentiful. But if insects abound they will be content with eating them in preference to anything else.—Interstate Farmer.

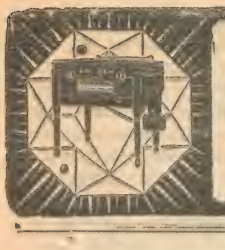
New Breeds of Fowls.

The Merits of Anconas and Orpingtons Described



BY G. BRADSHAW.

At the College competition a great difference in the laying capabilities of several pens of the same breed has been noticeable, and as some of these breeds—say, Orpingtons—are comparatively new, it will be wondered how this great divergence in producing powers has been brought about. The following assumed case is illustrative of how such was, or can, be done: Some years ago two poultry-breeds of this state—Messrs. Smith and Brown—hearing of the good, all-round fowls then becoming plentiful in England, determined on importing a few, which they each did from the same Old Country breeding establishment, and consisting of a cock and four hens each, the general flock in this yard being noted as a 100-egg strain, meaning thereby that a smaller or greater number of these fowls would lay, approximately, 100 eggs per year—some more, and certainly a few less. On arrival in Australia the importations were taken to their respective owners' yards, each having done away with all their other poultry stock; Smith having now secured the much-talked-of breed, considered there was nothing further to do but put them in the yard occupied by their plebian predecessors and commence breeding operations; which he did, and in a year or two had a fine collection of Black Orpingtons. The owner had, however, other irons in the fire, and no special attention was given to the fowls either in food, housing or mating; the hens, he thought, laid well, but when asked could give no information relative to numbers. Some made their own nests and reared a number of chickens, which, with others hatched in the ordinary way and of various ages, were all brought up together; they found much of their own food, and, when hand-fed, it was irregularly done. The cockerels and pullets of all ages were allowed to run together, when, at the end of the second year, it was found that scarcely one bird of the large flock had reached the size of the imported stock, some of the latter through neglected colds having in the meantime died. The surplus of the young birds were sold off, leaving a breeding-stock consisting of two cockerels and a number of pullets, all of which, with the survivors of the original stock, were allowed to breed together without any regard to selection, either as to type, size, or other qualities, and not even a thought given as to whether the hens were producing 50, 100, or more eggs a year. All the owner knew was that they were good fowls, and, according to his idea, laid well.

In the meantime there were not many Orpington breeders, and Smith's yards of big black fowls having become famous, a number of eggs for setting and stock-birds had been sold to other farmers, many of whom, like himself, having secured the breed were, without investigation, satisfied with the results, until one customer with practical intention kept a year's record of three hens, with the result that the whole output for the twelve months of the three was 180 eggs, or an average of 60 each, the much-vaunted breed falling in his and others' estimation when the facts became known.

A Worthy Gem

The Gem Incubator has established its intrinsic worth by its wonderful hatching qualities in the hands of hundreds of poultry raisers. "It is certainly a gem" is an expression heard wherever a Gem Incubator or Brooder is in use. Not a high priced hatcher (costs much less than most others) but a high per cent hatcher. Has many features not equaled in any other machine. Send for new, free catalogue.

THE GEM INCUBATOR CO., Box 100, Dayton, Ohio

Brown, on the other hand, was a practical breeder from the start. His birds, although penned up, were given ample food of the proper sort at regular times, with the other essentials of grit, green-stuff, etc. Each hen's eggs were duly marked and daily recorded, and as is usual in all flocks, whether good or bad, some were better layers than others. The eggs from the best producers only were used for hatching, and from the progeny the same care was exercised in selecting the best layers. These in turn were mated with the most typical and sturdy cockerel from the same pens, but of a different brood. This same system of selecting the best layers was put into effect with the progeny of the second mating, the best producers being mated back to the imported male bird, and the following year re-mating to the imported hens. By this time there were several crosses of the same family, and all the issue of selection for a special purpose. The desired result—a good laying strain being now established to such an extent that the majority of the progeny of almost any mating from this flock can be depended on to produce what the laying contest has shown possible, namely, a flock of hens capable of laying over ninety eggs each in six months. The illustration is one way of producing a laying strain, and although some theoretical people may object on the principle of the evil tendency of in-breeding—and there is no doubt that there are grounds for this objection if done indiscriminately, but when practised on scientific lines it is the safest way of securing and retaining some desirable quality, and is the system which practical farm and racing stock breeders resort to when a special feature of some celebrated sire is desired in the issue. In Shorthorn cattle in England the Bates' blood is always a desideratum, and in the fairs and other market-places where such stock are offered, it is always the key to the good sale of a Shorthorn to be able to certify that it is a "Bates" from both sides, i. e., Bates blood in both sire and dam. This principle is more apparent to Australians in "Carbine"-bred stock. Fleetness in the latter is the desirable quality, which was, by careful selection and breeding, implanted in the celebrated sire; and experience has shown that the issue, to a greater or lesser extent, not only proves this—that when both parents have an infusion of this blood the prepotency will be the greater to influence this peculiar quality in the offspring, but even despite this racing property being strongly implanted, such, by neglect in dietary, training, or other causes, may become lost, the efforts which brought into existence certain qualities must, to retain them, be as consistently exercised. Just in the same way a good laying strain of fowls, no matter how well established, if getting into the hands of some, may soon become a lost quality; while, with others, it may be improved. Reverting to the illustrations re the making or unmaking of laying strains, there is no suggestion that the laying qualities of Mr. Ward's birds was brought about in the way I have mentioned, for it is more than probable that the generous-laying quality was implanted in them in some English breeder's yard. Mr. W. Cook's object in originating the Orpington, of which he made the Langshan the foundation, was to get a large-bodied, clean-legged, black fowl, capable of laying more eggs than any variety of that time bred; and for several years after their introduction the originator declined exhibiting, well knowing that railway journeys, show-pen excitement, irregularity of diet, and other effects incidental to exhibiting poultry would be detrimental to the cultivation of a better-laying fowl, his own words on this subject being as follows: "The show pen will always have a strange fascination for many, the fancy will always hold its votaries in obedience, but the great future of the poultry-keeping industry does not lie here, but in the hard-headed, hard-handed toiler on the land—the farmer, the fruit-grower, the artisan, and the dwellers in cottages—and to assist these people in attempting to make their poultry pay, I brought out the Orpingtons, whose great characteristic is to produce more eggs than existing breeds; and my purpose is to continue improving them in this respect." That Cook's breed of Orpingtons justified his assertion about their laying qualities, those who have made importations from the Kent yards have frequently testified. However, there were other English Orpington specialists who are what are called show-goers. These people paid no attention to the internal qualities of the fowls, show-pen excellencies being the chief consideration. Whether the hens laid 40 or 100 eggs a year was of the very slightest importance, the winning of prizes and the selling, at big prices, of birds likely to win being the chief end. One thing is certain—both Cook's and other strains have been introduced to Australia, and it would be interesting to know whether the extraordinary good laying of one pen at the College, and the very poor records of others, could be traced to their English source; but, even admitting that all the strains of this breed imported were good laying ones, this is not enough, and there cannot be a shadow of doubt but that Mr. Ward gave special attention in one or various ways to the producing properties of his birds, for, were this not so, the laying qualities would have deteriorated more quickly than they were implanted. Mr. A. E. Henry's Wyandottes, which followed with eighty-six eggs per hen to their credit, must also have had special attention to this property, as also the Grantham Farm and Mr. Kennedy's White Leghorns, which produced seventy-eight eggs each in the six months. Bosanquets, Buff Orpingtons, and Tamb's Anconas produced seventy-four and seventy-five respectively for each hen, all of which are good laying strains of the respective breeds—a property which has been imparted to them by the careful selection, mating and management, either by the owners or other for this object. At the same time purchasers of stock or eggs from those mentioned, or the several others whose birds made a good record, need not think that the mere fact of buying some of the stock secures a permanently profitable lot of fowls, rather than this they have procured stock which, under favorable conditions, have proved themselves so, and by intelligent breeding, feeding, housing, and other reasonable attentions will continue good layers, wherein lies the profit.

On the same subject, a short time ago, the following question was put to Professor A. A. Brigham, of the Rhode Island Experimental Station, United States of America: "Can a strain of fowls be developed which will inherit a capacity to produce more eggs than the best of those we now have?" The answer was supplied in a bulletin issued by the Station, as follows: "Fecundity," which in fowls is indicated by great prolificness in the laying of eggs, is a quality which has been greatly increased in domestic animals by domestication. To-day some breeders are striving to bring their flocks up to an average egg production of 200 annually per hen. Food, shelter, care, management and exercise, all affect the fowl's egg production; but first of all the poultry man must seek for his flock a parentage and ancestry prolific in egg production. By means of recording nests, and personal study of his fowls, he is able to select hens which are large producers of eggs. With those fowls he mates a male bird selected from the progeny of a prolific mother. The progeny of such a pen will certainly show the quality of prolific egg production, but not all of the same degree. The pullets obtained will, under like environment, and with apparent equal opportunities, show considerable difference in their egg-laying capacity, some of the female parents will have transmitted to their offspring more strongly than others the desired quality of prolific egg production, in other words some great layers among hens have stronger powers of heredity than other equally great layers in transmitting the quality of prolific laying. By the closest study and watchfulness, the poultry breeder is enabled to gradually select on both the female and male sides, birds which in the highest degree have the power of transmitting the quality of plentiful egg-laying to their offspring. Continuing this process of selection from generation to generation, there may be developed a long line of breeders possessing the predominant power of hereditary fecundity. Likewise there may be obtained as hereditary characteristics plump breasts, early maturity, fine feathers, and almost any desired shape or size of body."

Before leaving the subject, a word of warning is necessary. All the good which has taken years to implant in a flock of fowls in the way of generous egg production may be lost by the introduction of a single male bird of unknown lineage. By scientific mating, new blood is rarely required; but when such has to be used, birds of the same descent or strain from another yard should be selected.

It may now be pertinently asked what has all the above to do with Anconas? My object is to me plain the fact that a breed of fowls at its origination may have been excellent layers, and continue so to the present day, or some families of the breed may now only retain the original characteristic; or it may be that the generous-laying properties are lost, and they have become the producers of but limited numbers and to which of the above categories Anconas at present belong, it is proposed in the following chapters to show.

ANCONAS AS EGG PRODUCERS.

As previously said, poultry are kept for one of two purposes, or both. The primary object, however, is and always has been with the idea of making money, it being generally accepted that after purchasing the proper food for a fowl or fowls and supplying it in suitable quantities, coupled with other intelligent management, this fowl or fowls will give in return a quantity of eggs per week, month or year, which when put in the market will realize sufficient to pay for the food and labor and leave a surplus for the owner. This has been briefly termed poultry keeping for eggs. Another branch of the business frequently associated with this is rearing chickens for the market, many people such as suburban residents, fruit growers and farmers, who keep many or few fowls as a sort of auxiliary to their other business or trade, breeding both for eggs and meat. In the spring months eggs are usually the cheapest, and this is the best time for breeding and rearing for the market. For this purpose certain breeds of fowls are more suitable than others, but as previously stated, laying is not so much a matter of breed as of strain; on the other hand, certain breeds are much more profitable than others when carcasses for market is the object. Breeding for eggs, or egg farming, is practised by a great many in this state. These people may be called specialists from the fact that they make this the sole object of their operations, and in the majority of cases it is the most remunerative branch of poultry keeping. Some of these breeders keep one or two varieties of pure-bred fowls, others have some special cross from which they get satisfactory results, but all try for and the majority accomplish the production of eggs all the year round, for, as is too well known, while any old hen will lay in the spring when eggs are cheap, the majority cease producing when eggs are at their dearest. Egg farming, as a rule, when practiced on intelligent lines, pays better than when breeding chickens are included in the business, the chief reason being that the returns are much quicker, for as soon as the eggs are produced they can be marketed, in fact the shorter the time from the point of laying till marketed the better, new-laid eggs always being sought after in greater quantities than they can be supplied, whereas if chickens are hatched they require some months of feed, care and trouble—if reared at all—before they be brought to market. A good hen will lay a dozen eggs in a fortnight, worth 1s., while an ordinary chicken is only worth that amount at the end of about a couple of months or more, and during that time will have eaten as much food as it took to produce the eggs, together with other expenses, care and trouble, and the owner lying out of his capital for the longer period. This brings me to the crux of the question; to which of these branches of poultry-keeping are Anconas most suited? From the experience of the numerous English and local breeders there cannot be much difficulty in arriving at a decision, every reference to the breed pointing to its one special feature—that of being generous egg-producers.

The earliest mention of them is that they belong to the Spanish race of fowls, and more than a hundred years ago this race had the credit of being wonderful layers, and a table published in the English Agricultural Gazette, as far back as 1852, gives details of four birds of this breed, hatched on April 10, which commenced to lay on December 7, and produced for the twelve months 928 eggs, or 232 for each hen, a record which if correct puts in the shade any of our present-day breeds or strains. In 1854 Martin Doyle concludes his description of this breed by saying: "They possess the general characteristics of the Spanish race, and are excellent layers." In 1868 they are described by John Bailey as being prolific layers, and to produce unusually large eggs. Another writer of the same period stated that they were very hardy and with no end to their laying. The next record is that attaching to those imported by Captain Rowle, the same generous laying attribute still attaching to the breed, which brings us down to the Anconas of modern times. The several English writers' testimony, which appeared in the previous portion of this article, that the characteristics attached to the Spanish race of fowls a hundred years ago has remained unimpaired in the Anconas until the present day is confirmed by modern writers, who specially mention them as excellent layers.

It may, however, be protested that the attributes for which the breed is celebrated may be largely due to environment or climatic conditions, and while doing well, as has been shown in England, they may be a failure or partially so in this country. The evidence, however, is satisfactory. At Greta, 130 miles north of Sydney, the importer there has stated that with him Anconas are very good layers of fine white eggs, over the average size and much larger than the Orpingtons. At Penrith they averaged 165 eggs a year per hen, not the laying of one hen, which is a very different matter, for among a flock of admittedly bad layers of any breed there may be an individual capable of the above record, but when a flock of hens lay over thirteen dozen eggs each in the twelve months, their value becomes apparent to the poultry-breeder who makes this the principal branch of his operations.

During the year in question, eggs average over 1s. a dozen all the year round, this revenue of 13s. each from a yard of hens being the most eloquent evidence in favor of the belated hen. In connection with these articles, I had purposed going lengthily into the various methods and cost of feeding fowls in relation to egg-production, but as other and not less important breeds await treatment, I must defer the feed question for future extended reference, except at present to say that people need not run away with the idea that the above 13s. is all profit, the food bill for a year such as this is a big item in reducing the profits from any kind of stock. In normal years a hen's keep is approximately 1d. a week, or say 4s. for the twelve months, and, as is too well-known, the present year the above food account will have to be doubled, which would leave about 5s. a year profit on each hen; this, however, will be increased by the fact that the present year's average for eggs will ce considerably above the normal. Reverting to the Anconas, an importer at Moss Vale, with conditions, temperatures, etc., totally differing from those up north, says: "I have found them excellent layers, particularly towards the end of winter." Another breeder in the same district says they are good layers of very large eggs, three of the hens laying larger eggs than Minorcas. The Victorian (Grippsland) correspondent, Mr. J. F. Travers, has had a similar experience, as follows: "I brought the Anconas out with me from England now nearly two years ago, and have found them excellent layers. The chickens are very hardy and precocious, and learn to look after themselves at a very early age; the majority I have reared in foster mothers. The birds are certainly wild but soon get to know the person who tends them, and are quite tame with them, but if a stranger goes amongst them they are easily scared. The eggs are scarcely so large as those of some other breeds, but are not small. The demand for the birds and eggs so far has not been very large, but it is improving, and their great laying qualities should soon bring them to the front."

The above opinions are overwhelmingly conclusive that, unlike some of the other breeds, Anconas are to-day celebrated for the very same properties for which they were distinguished nearly a century ago, and, whatever may result in the future, there is no evidence so far that actually bad-laying strains have developed, and this, despite the fact that, of the two lots of this breed which competed at the College, one was low in the contest, still they were two pens anead of the celebrated Minorcas, one of Andalusians, and one each of Wyandottes and Orpingtons, and as the competition is being continued for a further term, the full year's record will be of much interest as showing how they come out in winter production, as is claimed for them by several patrons. At the same time, there is a fear evinced that Anconas may go the way of many other breeds, namely, deteriorate in useful qualities. The following extract on this subject by Mr. E. Cobb, an English poultry expert, is taken from the second edition of "Profitable Poultry," which may be had on application to the Department of Agriculture: "Those who launch the Ancona as an exhibition fowl will only have themselves to blame if in years to come it has lost that for which it is now recommended; but being launched, and having taken the hold that it has on the fancy, I am of opinion that it will pay the fancier more profit if it only lays one hundred instead of as at present two hundred eggs a year, and that by the time this does happen another breed will be found to take the utility place vacated by the Ancona." That this danger is apprehended by some of our own breeders will be seen from Mr. Lurcock's communication, which concludes with the following: "I think when they become more generally known they will be more sought after as a utility fowl, that is, if breeders do not sacrifice their utility qualities for show points, which I do not intend to do."

Prior to the introduction of this breed to Australia it was generally understood that as the fowls were small the eggs were naturally so. Such idea has, however, with many others, received a rude shock by the result of the six months' contest at the College. Of the forty-one pens competing there were two of Anconas, both owned by breeders who have contributed their experience to this article. One of the pens finished sixth in the competition, leaving thirty-five pens behind; but more remarkable, the 444 eggs laid by these smallish fowls were heavier than the 451 laid by Buff Orpingtons and 469 laid by White Leghorns and thus secured the third prize for the greatest weight of eggs, the 444 weighing exactly 60 lbs., the market value of which was £2 17s. 4d. The eggs from both pens in the competition weighed twenty-six ounces to the dozen, thus setting at rest all theories or opinions relative to size. I must now revert to a peculiarity of Anconas which is puzzling, and which with some poultry-keepers would be a rather severe handicap—I refer to the innate wildness of the breed, the majority of the old country breeders agreeing with those in Australia as to this peculiar trait. "Very wild," "Fly like magpies," "Scoot away on the approach of strangers," and other terms are used by various breeders, but all admit that with careful treatment they become as tame as any other breed, and particularly so with those who tend them. In conclusion, it will be seen from all the above testimonies and experiences that this variety of fowls are celebrated for egg production only—no end o flaying, lay well in winter, and big eggs,—hence for those who make egg farming the principal branch of their poultry business this breed of fowls should be most satisfactory, and here it should be made clear that they must not be classed as meat-producers, being simply generous layers, hardy, and inexpensive to keep through being small feeders.

RUTHERFORD'S SHOW.

The Rutherford Poultry Pigeon and Pet Stock Association, of Rutherford, N. J., are fast coming to be known as one of the leading Associations of the East. Their popularity and success is due to their methods of conducting their exhibition in a fair and impartial manner, and has secured to them the hearty co-operation of the "fanciers" who are assured that their specimens sent for exhibition will be well taken care of and shown to the best advantage; that the premiums and specials won are paid promptly, and that the birds are re-cooped and sent back without delay.

At the recent annual meeting the following members were elected for the ensuing year of 1904-05: President, Mr. Wm. E. Huntington, vice-president, Mr. Henry Kretzler; treasurer, Mr. Geo. C. Brinkerhoff; secretary, Mr. Geo. H. Fesseden; auditor, Mr. F. A. Stedman.

It is to be noted that the majority of the above officers were members of the committee who had their 4th annual show in charge last fall, and brought it to a successful issue.

The association has appointed their committee to arrange for the fifth annual exhibition to be held in the fall of this year, and have selected the following date: Dec. 15, 16 and 17, 1904. Competent judges whose names are familiar to all for fairness and integrity, will be engaged, and it is promised that even larger premiums, cups, and specials will be given this year than ever before, and all breeders are requested to write for premium lists which will be ready at an early date.

HECK'S REMARKS.

If Drevenstedt will continue to give us a column or two of stuff each week by "West Point" and "Yakob Pilsener," the American Fancier will be worth double the regular price, but if "West Point" don't quit rapping the editor of Successful Poultry Journal we won't love him a bit and that's no joke.—Successful Poultry Journal.

Judges and exhibitors need a handsome leather-bound copy of the new Illustrated Standard. Price, two dollars.

BARRED AND BUFF ROCKS.

I have won the past season at the following shows: Fitchburg, Mass., Stamford, Conn., South Framingham, Mass., Manchester, N. H., New Bedford, Mass. The above Barred Cockerels were all sired by 3d cockerel, 1903, Madison Square Garden, New York winner, 63 cockerels in this class. Reliable Poultry Journal February, 1903, liked this cockerel above all others in the show. I have a few cockerels sired by above cockerel for sale from $4.00 upwards. Standard weight, of very even color, barred well all over. If you want to improve your blood these cockerels are what you want. Money returned if birds don't suit you. I have had my pens mated up by one of the leading Poultry Judges in America—4 pens headed by high scoring cockerels. I have also one pen of Buff Rocks. For the cockerel in this pen and two pullets I gave Mr. Higgins, of Orange, Mass., $75. I have not many sittings to dispose of therefore have your orders booked early. My eggs will be from same pens as I breed from myself. Choicest Eggs $2.00 a sitting.

GEYER'S SCURVY CURE FOR POULTRY was the first article introduced to the public for this purpose, which has been thoroughly tested in the last ten years by many of our brother fanciers who are willing to say with us that there is no other article on the market like this that can be relied on to do its work properly. It is something that the poultry fancier, who appreciates his fine birds, needs very much. What looks more disgraceful than a fine flock of chickens, many, or all of them, having their legs coated with a thick, hard, scabby crust which is called scurvy? It spoils the appearance of the birds and is very annoying to them. It is also contagious. Here we have a sure cure for this ugly disease. By following the directions we guarantee that it will take off that ugly, hard coat and leave the legs clean and smooth and give them their natural color. It also has no equal for healing sores and frosted combs and wattels. It makes them very bright and red. It is just what the exhibitor wants to prepare his birds for the exhibition room. Some of our customers tell us that they have tried it with good results for weak legs. We only ask you to give it a trial. It is put up in tin boxes. Money must accompany all orders. Price, 25 cents. Address, G. A. Geyer, Florin, Pa. 560tf

By Using Geyer's Champion Disinfectant & Vermin Destroyer

There are, in all classes of powders before the public, many calculated for the sure cure of lice and vermin and a dozen other purposes, yet are they reliable, and have they produced the results claimed?

In offering this compound, we offer a powder such as is not before the public, and fills a place that none other can for the purpose intended—a positive, sure disinfectant and destroyer of all vermin that invests either poultry, small animals, those of the barn yard.

It is a perfect destroyer of all disease germs, and produces a healthy odor wherever distributed. It is a sure cure for gapes, in young chicks.

If you are skeptical and don't believe in Powders or compouud because of many worthless ones on the market, we ask, please cast aside your prejudice and give this compound a trial. It is put up in 2 pound boxes. Price 25c. 560tf

Breed and Variety

Shape More Important Than Color.

By H. S. Babcock.

In these days, when so called new varieties are multiplying without fear or restraint, when the change in color, in leg feathering or in comb is all that is deemed necessary to make a new variety, we are running into great danger of forgetting the difference between breed and variety and of neglecting in our so-called new varieties the most important characteristics. Color, color, color is all we seem to think about. But color is not all; nay, it is not even the most that we should regadr. Color does not make a breed.

Let us discriminate between the terms breed and variety, for we "mix those babies up" altogether too much for clearness of thinking. We hear the buff Plymouth Rock, the Buff Wyandotte, the Columbian Wyandotte and the like spoken of as new breeds, just as we used to hear the white Java, the white Plymouth Rock and as 'the new white breeds." There is but one Plymouth the white Wyandotte classed together Rock breed, though there are barred, white, bluff and black varieties advertised of the Plymouth Rock breed. There is but one Wyandotte breed, and the silver, the golden, the white, the black and the buff Wyandottes are varieties of the one breed. From this it is evident that color doesn't make a breed, though it may make a variety of a breed. A variety is simply a subclass of a breed, and must be counted under the breed. We have among dogs black, liver, black and white, liver and white, lemon and white Pointers, but there is the one breed and the colors don't make different breeds. If one should advertise that he had a liver, white and tan Pointer, a marking that occurs but rarely, and that his was a new breed of Pointers, every dog fancier would laugh him to scorn, but it would be as sensible and defensible to do this as it is to advertise each change in color as a new breed. The color of the Plymouth Rock didn't make the breed, for before the Plymouth Rock was the Dominique with the same color, and before the Dominique was the hawk-colored hens of our grandfathers' days, scratching about the barnyards of the old homestead, with the same colored plumage. Color may be the distinctive badge of a variety ,but color does not and cannot make a breed.

If color does not make a breed, what does then? If this is to be answered in a word, that word would be shape. Shape, to be exact, is not sufficient but so far as outward characteristics are concerned, shape makes the breed, color the variety. A better definition of a breed would be a race of fowls possessing like external and internal characteristics. But for the purpose we have in view, shape is a sufficient definition. The Plymouth Rock is a Plymouth Rock, not because of its color but because of its shape. A Wyandotte is a Wyandotte, not because it has specific color or markings but because it possesses a specific shape. A Brahma is a Brahma, not in virtue of its color but in virtue of its shape. No matter how perfect the color ,unless a fowl possesses the typical shape of the breed, using the term with some latitude, it possesses no right to the breed name.

To apply what has been said to some of the alleged new varieties, it will be seen that irrespective of the perfection of the coloring, a buff Leghorns lacking the Leghorn shape, a buff Wyandotte lacking the Wyandotte shape, a buff Brahma lacking the Brahma shape, and a buff Plymouth Rock lacking the Plymouth Rocks shape, are not entitled to the names they assume. There may be typically shaped specimens of all these varieties, that there are of the Leghorns does not admit of questions, but at our poultry exhibitions have been exhibited, and awarded prizes, too, so-called buff Wyandottes that lacked the true Wyandotte shape, buff Brahmas that possessed the figure of a Cochin, buff Plymouth Rocks that in their shape seemed to have had no Plymouth Rocks in their ancestry. They were all very pretty fowls, as the puff plumage is always pretty, but they were not Brahmas, Wyandottes and Plymouth Rocks. They did not deserve the name they bore and they were not entitled to win a prize under such a name.

This is a matter for judges to aid in rectifying. If they will refuse to give a prize to a specimen of a new variety that is so lacking in typical shape that it could not score eighty-five points, they will very soon compel breeders of new varieties to give to shape the importance it demands and the varieties will be like the breed whose name they take in every external characteristic except color. When they possess such characteristics they will be cntitled to the breed name and not before.

Shape has been named as a more important characteristic tnan color, and as a breed characteristic it is entitled to this distinction . But upon another important ground shape should be considered of primary importance. Internal qualities are correlated with shape and not with color, at least not to so marked a degree. He would be a brave man who would dare to assert that there was no connection, whatever, between color and internal qualities, but the connection is much less important than that between shape and internal characteristics. The Mediterranean class of fowls, Spanish, Leghorns, Minorcas, Andalusians and Anconas, has a definite shape, and this whole family is very prolific. It is, so to speak, an egg shape, which they possess. The Hamburgh class, including the Red Caps, has a specific shape, in general particularly resembling that of the Mediterranean, and the Hamburgh family is noted for its marvelous production of eggs. If this shape was greatly changed it is altogether probable that the productiveness of the fowls would change with it. The shape is an indication, if not a guaranty, that the fowl possessing it will be a good layer. And so the Indian Game has a distinctive shape and its shape is correlated with remarkable table properties. Change the shape of the Indian Game and the table qualities of the fowl would change with it. It woul seem, therefore,that shape should be placed before color in considering what makes a fowl worthy of its name. For example, a so-called buff Brahma is shown. If it has the Brahma shape there is some reason to expect it will have the meat and egg qualities of the Brahma, if it lacks the Brahma shape, what right has anyone to expect it will have the Brahma qualities. A buff Wyandottes is exhibited. If it has the plump build of the Wyandotte, one would naturally expect that it would lay and would dress off very much like a Wyandotte, but if it lacks the Wyandotte shape, is there any guaranty of its possessing the Wyandotte qualities? A buff Plymouth Rock appears. If it has the typical Plymouth Rock, it is fair to suppose it will have the typical Plymouth Rock qualities, but if it lacks this shape, its qualities become an uncertainty. Typical shape, then, should be insisted upon, not only for the onward appearance of the fowl, but as an indication of its internal qualities. It is not enough that the specimen has good color, for color does not make the breed.

Color, however, is not to be neglected. In fowls, especially for exhibition, color is a very important characteristic, and ranks second only to shape. He only is a successful breeder who can produce typical shape and pure color. Both are to be sought for, both to be prized, but color never should be allowed even in an exhibition specimen to obscure the indispensability of typical shape, and least of all in new varieties. Imperfection of color in new varieties can be treated leniently, but imperfection of shape should be treated without mercy, for in no other way, or at least in no other way so well, can the new varieties be made worthy of the names they assume. If it fails in these essentials, if it lacks the typical shape and the internal qualities correlated with that shape, the public will justly consider itself defrauded by the new variety. It can patiently bear with imperfection in color, with a little misplaced black or white in the plumage, but it has no patience with a variety that lacks the well-known breed qualities. For the sake of the breed whose name the variety takes, and for the sake of the variety that it may be worthy of the name, and for the sake of the public which invests its dollars in the new variety, typical shape should always and everywhere be insisted upon.

SHORT REMINDERS.

A series of short reminders upon important points, many of which have already been referred to in my foregoing articles, should prove useful to readers whose memory is not, perhaps, as good as their eyesight.

Don't forget to keep four fowl stock young; old hens are wholly unprofitable to keep.

Don't forget that cocks as well as hens eat a lot of food, and no cock is necessary except during the hatching season.

Don't forget that unfertile eggs keep much longer fresh than eggs laid by hens running with a cock.

Don't forget that non-sitting hens lay far more eggs in the twelve months than the heavy sitting breeds.

Don't forget to keep your nests clean; stained eggs are not marketable.

Don't forget that eggs collected daily should always be stored in glass water, and left there until wanted for market.

Don't forget that dry stored eggs soon become more or less stale, especially in hot weather.

Don't forget to grade your eggs as to size; it improves them sample, and consequently the price.

Don't forget that large loose-feathered hens of the Cochin or Brahma type lay small eggs, and but few of them. They are also large eaters and poor rangers.

Don't forget that close-feathered, medium-sized hens of the Leghorn type are non-sitters, good rangers and great layers.

Don't forget that it costs as much to keep a hen that lays 80 eggs in the year as one that lays 130.

Don't forget that a broody hen spoils a fertile egg for table purposes by sitting on it for a few hours only, so collect your eggs regularly.

Don't forget that broody hens after April are seldom wanted, and cause considerable loss.

Don't forget the vinegar diluted in warm water is the best liquid to clean stained eggs.

Don't forget that brown shelled eggs are no richer than white ones, but those who prefer tinted eggs should immerse their eggs for an hour in stronge tea water.

Don't forget to preserve your eggs in water glass when the market price is less that 15 for 1s.

Don't forget that fowls should not be fed near the door of your dwelling house or they will stand about all day looking for food.

Don't forget that fowls roosting in trees and open buildings seldom lay many eggs, and those they do lay are often laid astray and lost.

Don't forget that under-fed fowls lay but few eggs, and over-fed ones often none at all.

Don't forget that the best layers are early risers and early morning layers, and of an active disposition.

Don't forget that white-legged fowls require a warm, dry soil, whilst yellow and dark legged varieties will often thrive upon cold and wet clays.

Don't forget that the egg yield from 10 or 12 hens ranging over an acre of grass land will far more than pay the rent of it, and so leave the herbage rent free to your dairy stock.

Don't forget that fowls much improve the character of the land over which they range.

Don't forget to feed your fowls upon clean ground, and not to cast grain and meal upon muddy yards and roadways, where much is trodden under foot.

Don't forget the importance of distributing your fowls over your land in small flocks of 20 or 30 head, rather than crowding too many together.

Don't forget that corn purchased by the sack, or two sacks, is much cheaper than in small quantites.

Don't forget that it takes but little more time and labor to attend to a flock of 40 head of fowls than 10 or 15.

Don't forget that hens in windy weather and without shelter will not lay, and soon become "roupy."

Don't forget that chopped raw onion is a valuable and simple remedy to give to a sick and drooping fowl.

Don't forget that crushed green bone is a cheap and valuable food to give to both hens and chickens.

Don't forget that hen manure is a valuable fertilizer, and should not be wasted.

Don't forget that it is the early hatched chickens that come on to lay during the following autumn and winter, when eggs are scarce and dear.

Don't forget to replace one-third of your laying hens every year, so as to keep your stock young.

Don't forget to feed and kill off your cockerels when about four months old.

Don't forget the importance of feeding young chickens early, late, and often; and dry food is far better than moist, such as crushed grain, stale bread, and coarse biscuit meal.

Don't forget to feed up your chickens for a week or ten days before marketing them; skinng, half-fed fowls never fetch a remunerative price.

Don't forget that early spring and summer chickens always command a far better price than months later.

Don't forget to keep hen-houses clean, and the nests and bodies of your fowls free from vermin (lice). Paraffin and lime wash the interior of roosts periodically.

Don't forget that the best and heaviest grain is in the long run more economical food for fowls that light refuse, so often served to them.

Don't forget when a lot of fowls become "roupy" and diseased, it is of far more importance to remove the cause than to doctor your stock. Damp, exposed houses, with foul, wet surroundings, is highly prejudicial.

Don't forget that chickens should be reared upon fresh ground every year to ensure success, and coops often shifted.

Don't forget that a hen that lays three or four eggs per week, at a cost of about one penny for food, is probathe most profitable stock upon your farm.

Don't forget that poultry-keeping involves colse attention and considerable labor, and that it is far better to be understocked than overstocked.

Don't forget to keep some simple debit and credit account to see how you stand at the end of the year.

Although these several items I have referred to may appear to be a somewhat formidable catalogue of matter needing attention, most of them are really nothing more than commonplace truths, which should appeal to the minds of all youltry-keepers without my emphasizing their importance. —Belfast News Letter.

TABASCO SAUCE.

A change has come over the spirit of his dreams.

The country has at last a chance to be thankful.

A silver lining has at last appeared on the horizon.

Live, horse, and you'll get grass.

Many more things might be said in the same tones, but Drev. says Link Orr says, "What's the use?"

Curtis has devoted the entire June issue to poultry matters, save about one inch.

Just think of it?

Most extraordinary case on record.

Still I am thankful. Now if Theo. will do what he intended doing all will be well.

Now, boys, let up and let's be happy again.

If you fellows will saw wood and stop fighting it will be hard for Roundabout Robby and me.

We will not have anything to write about.

Hully Gee! I can see my finish.

Just for luck, in my last kick I note a warble from Texas.

Say, Mac, why in thunder did you have to mix in the squabble?

I expected more from a gentleman from the south.

You ain't a friend of Curtis, eh? Well, you ought to be.

I'll see you at St. Louis. I'll be there, you bet. Georgie Burgott has given me his Pan-Am. pass.

Re World's Fair I see the com. of 3 is going to do just what I proposed.

Say, Drev., you ought to have noted that you had my plan before the three ducks made their announcement.

Tommy McGrew is going to judge at the new N. Y. show, eh?

It would be a long time before he would get a chance to judge at the Garden.

Eggs at half price for the balance of the season? What a foolish thing. Do not be a clam.

When ordering a new standard do not forget the American Fancier.

Frankie, don't stub your toe.

Minneapolis is making a stab for the next A. P. A. meeting.

I understand there is a little deal on for Minnie.

Billy Atherton has been selected as a judge at "St. Louey."

He'll have to pay admission every day, though. Can't get a camera strong enough to stand his face.

Say, Billy, borrow Northup's, grow a little fatter, put on some more gall and there you are.

Wouldn't she get sick! if a certain "lady" writer could grow chickens to keep up with the quantity (not quality) of her writings.

If I knew half as much as she pretends to know I'd show the boys a trick or two.

But I don't and never will, so I must be content.

Bro. Rankin of the Northwest I notice takes a few spokes out of the Hub?

That's right, Rankin, old stuff. You know the goose that lays the golden egg.

A pair of Orr's have lost another job.

According to the Reliable, the compensation for those three ducks on cooping is to be left to the Live Stock commission.

Have you noticed lately the stuff in the poultry journals regarding World's Fair Show?

Well, I have, and Tom Orr's name seems very few and far between.

In a recent bulletin Steinmesch signs his name as supt. Rather misleading.

Now that Col. Mills has charge, presume it's in order for those judges.

I hear that Cheston is working up a winning line of White Wyandottes.

But then the right bower Smith is no longer.

In reading the awards next winter of the different advertisers, do not get mixed "Madison Square Garden winners," New York winners or Herald Square winners. There is a big difference.

In looking over the Reliable I saw Charley Welles' "pictur" what a beautiful expression! How serene he looks!

Must have been thinking of those winning Barred Rocks he bred. Charley would never pull a false feather. Oh, no!

Wonder if Duston is going to show at St. Louis?

Say, Curtis; get Roundabout Robby to write the history of the A. P. A.

Did you notice that photo of the com. of 5? Well, just look it over.

Well, there is Link Orr, to commence with, recently known as "cheapskate." I often wonder how the A. P. A. chose him for Pres. Still wonders will never cease. Accidents will happen. What's the use?

Next comes Kimmey, the grand old man. Justice notice his expression. Fred L. never misses a trick when the Kodak is around. Ain't he proud of himself? Well, I reckon.

Gies & Co. representation. Don's know "nuthin" about this "guy."

Ah! here is our only Grant, as next man. What an angelic look he has mustered up for the occasion. What a fine, noble forehead is exposed. Don't he look sweet? Yes, indeed.

Our own "Thomas Edison" Orr, supt. World's Fair, comes next. His picture, like the superintendency, seems to be in the background and rather shaded.

And last but not least, comes American Eagle Drev. He leads one to think that he (Drev.) was sitting for a plaster cast or else he was mustering up courage to ask Supt. Orr for a commission to judge St. Louey. Now be quiet in those back seats.

On the whole, those five ducks have learned a lesson. Not one word have I heard regarding their meetings save what Thomas has sent out, and I've kept my ear to the ground, too.

Silence is golden, you bet. Keep that in mind and you'll never be a lobster.

The illustration of a pair of Silkies on the title page reminds us of the fact that this ancient and unique breed is becoming very popular. Both Mr. A. E. Blunck and Mr. H. J. Quilhot, who keep Silkies, are unable to furnish stock or eggs.

The Hon. James A. Stovell of Philadelphia, Pa., imported a pair of Silky males from Japan last season and may succeed in getting a goodly flock together by fall.

Although Silkies are chiefly bred for ornament, they are very useful in other respects, being exceptionally good setters and mothers. Crossed with a Cochin Bantam, an ideal setting hen and mother is produced, one of the quiet, gentle kind that do not expect three day old chickens to leap fences and fly up in trees.

Silkies lay well in winter time, and although the meat and skin are dark, the carcass makes fine eating, notwithstanding its looks.

Silkies are hardy and the chickens easy to rear. Owing to the silky texture of the feathers they are more subject to lice, but good sprinkling with fine tobacco dust and a dust bath placed under a glass sash will keep the crawlers away. The fifth toe, while an indication of pure bloodedness, is not an ornament. It should be bred out. The blood of the Silky is strong and will assert itself when crossed with the blood of other breeds, and new varieties can be made ad libitum by careful selections. The silky texture is imparted quite strongly on the first cross.

The many friends of Charles Jehl, Elberon, N. J., secretary of the National Bantam Association, will regret to learn that he is confined to his bed with a severe attack of typhoid fever. Much encouragement for his recovery is offered by the attending physician, and although the critical period of the disease is passed, it will be many weeks before he will be able to attend to his regular duties. Mr. Jehl has always been an enthusiastic Bantam fancier and has proved himself an excellent and efficient officer of the National Bantam Association. Much sympathy is due his family and especially to Mrs. Jehl, who is a bride of but a few weeks.

Superintendent of Poultry W. S. Gladney, Jr., at the great Trenton fair, writes: "As I do not want another show crowded like it was last year, I shall positively limit the entries to one thousand." That means one bird in a coop in single entries, the only correct and fair way to show valuable birds. Quality, not quantity, is, or should be, the motto of all well conducted exhibitions.

The premium list of the New York State Fair has just been issued. It is the most complete ever sent out. The poultry department has the largest and best arranged classification we have seen provided by the commissioners in charge. There are 677 classes of poultry and 172 classes of pigeons and pet stock. The premiums are liberal and the entry fees are 10 per cent. on all the first premiums competed for. There is an additional coop fee of twenty-five cents for single birds and fifty cents for pens. These fees must be paid at the time of making entry. Entries close August 8. Copies of this list can be procured of Stanton C. Shaver, Secretary, Albany, N. Y.

Where gapes are prevalent, plow or dig up the infested soil and use plenty of air slaked lime. In fall throw the soil in high ridges and coved with lime It will end the gape-worm reign.

When we pick up a poultry journal and find alleged poultrymen stating: "The smaller the Bantams the more valuable they are," we feel like throwing up the business and take to the woods. Such advice is pure rot and absolutely dangerous. There is a limit to the size of Bantams for exhibition and breeding purposes. This every expert breeder of them knows. But when some get wise by breeding a few cull Bantams and rush into print, they cause trouble at once and get others into trouble. The new Standard will make it plain enough to the novice that the Bantam nearest the Standard weight is the best bird, all other points being equal.

The same holds good in breeding Bantams; in fact, many of our best breeders select the strongest females, albeit they may be a trifle overweight, to mate with the best male obtainable, one that is vigorous but not coarse in build.

One of our most noted Game Bantam fanciers always bred from his May and June hatched birds, utilizing the August hatched stock for late show purposes. In fact, one of England's authorities advises not to breed from females under fourteen ounces. These are cold facts based on the experience of men that have made a success of the business.

According to the June Reliable Poultry Journal, Mr. Frank Heck, editor of the Successful Poultry Journal, is "on earth."

So the Hon. David A. Nichols sent the first order in for a Morocco bound copy of the New Standard. Good. "Rare Old Dave" always wants the best and also likes to be in the front rank of the procession. He judges by a Standard and is also willing to be judged by one.

To Mr. William Holmes, P. M., Shelton, Conn.:

Kindly stop looking over your Buff Plymouth Rocks long enough to inform the president of the Costly Fishing Club, and also the worthy secretary of the latter, that several members are awaiting your command to go into camp next month and startle the wily trout ,and perhaps the natives, by their Waltonian attempts to deprive the streams and lakes of some of their finny inhabitants.

Barney W. Mosher, Johnstown, N. Y., has completed a fine Bantam house and will be in shape next winter to keep over a large number of his famous Japanese Bantams, as well as have room for several other varieties of choice fowl, including some imported Houdans.

Mr. Aniscough, the famous Game and Game Bantam breeder of England, will be unable to come to Canada next September to judge the Games and Game Bantams, consequently Mr. Richard Oke will take those classes at the great Canadian Exposition to be held at Toronto, September 3 to 10.

The following excellent advice on June chickens in Poultry,England, can well be followed by chicken fanciers here, and in northern and eastern sections the season may be extended into July:

"Some poultry yards are still short of chickens, but there is ample time yet to make up for lost ground. So to those poultry-keepers who have not done as well as they anticipated, I say, continue hatching. To some this will sound strange. There is an old couplet that runs:—

Chicks that are hatched when there's making of hay,
Will never grow up, but pine away.

And, surprising as it may appear, there are many poultry-keepers who, even in this enlightened age, believe implicitly in it, for they aver, although they will not, perhaps, acknowledge the couplet, that June is too late for chickens. But is it? I have not found it to be. The nights are shorter in June than in May; the weather is warmer. There are still four months to the end of October, all good growing months, with genial weather, and at that age chickens will stand anything. They are three weeks or a month later, and that is all that can be said against them.

It may be thought that there must be some foundation for the old lines. So there is. The sun's rays are very powerful during summer, hence if chickens or other young stock are entirely exposed to them they will assuredly die. But the remedy is simple. Put the coops or artificial rearers in a shady place, but near the sunshine. As in April the poultry-keeper gladly turns them to face the sun whenever it appears, so in June reverse the order of things. Let them be near covert if possible for the chickens—shrubs, artichokes, peas, sunflowers, anything that produces shade and harbors insects. Chickens will congregate there during the greater part of the day, and always when the sun is most powerful. The youngsters will find there the insects that have deserted the parched grass, and, as everybody knows, insects are excellent food for chickens.

AMERICAN POULTRY ASSOCIATION.

The time has arrived when the Executive committee of the American Poultry Association should decide upon the place of our next annual meeting. The meeting to be held at St. Louis, October 27th, 1904, in connection with the Poultry Show of the World's Fair, will be an adjournment of the 1904 meeting held at Rochester, N. Y.

There are but two invitations for the 1905 meeting:

First. From the New York Poultry and Pigeon Association to meet them during the week of their show, January 2-7, 1905, at Madison Square Garden, N. Y.

Second. From the Minneapolis, Minnesota, Poultry Association to meet with them during the week of their show, January 9-14, 1905.

In connection with this circular there is sent to each member of the Executive Committee a postal card on which to record and forward his vote to the Secretary. These postal cards should reach the Secretary by June 30, 1904, and it is hoped that every member will express his preference as to place of holding the meeting.

Please fill in "New York" or "Minneapolis" as you wish your vote to be recorded.

In many of the poultry journals there is reprinted this month a circular sent out from this office concerning the progress of the New Standard. A copy of that circular was sent to each member of the Executive Committee. Quite a number have responded by forwarding $2 for one of the first copies of the New Illustrated Standards, to be bound in Morocco flexible back. The first order to come in was from our ex-President, Hon. D. A. Nichols, of Shelton, Connecticut. If one hundred more should do so, and half this number would also send an application for Life Membership from some friend interested in pure-bred poultry, it would help to keep our financial pot boiling; through the summer it does not require much, but the sale of old Standards is now very small.

If enough poultry journals take advantage of heavy cash discount offered on June orders, 100 copies for $97, 500 copies for $475, 1000 copies for $900, we shall be able to put out our annual book to Proceedings. It will be a large and expensive one this year on account of the discussion on revision.

All cash-in-advance orders for New Standards received by June 30, will be reported to the poultry journals with the vote on place of meeting.

NEW CHIEF OF LIVE STOCK AT WORLD'S FAIR.

Colonel Charles F. Mills has been appointed Chief of the Department of Live Stock of the Universal Exposition to succeed F. D. Coburn, whose ill health made necessary his resignation. Mr. Coburn is now resting and endeavoring to regain his health, and the hope is entertained that his recovery may be rapid and that in the near future he may be able to take up his important work as Secretary of the Kansas Board of Agriculture.

Chief Mills has been associated with Mr. Coburn as Secretary of the Department of Live Stock since its organization. He assumes charge of the department with the most intimate knowledge of the classification and all the preparations and plans so far completed for the Live Stock Show of the Exposition. The arrangement of the distribution of the $280,000 in Exposition live stock prize money and the numberless and complicated matters daily growing out of the provisions for shows of more than double the magnitude of any ever before planned are entirely familiar to Colonel Mills. Added to this he has undoubtedly a more extended experience in live stock exposition matters and personal acquaintance with breeders and exhibitors than any other person. He had the active charge of the live stock show at the Columbian Exposition in 1893, which has stood unrivalled up to this time as the best managed and greatest of all the live stock exhibitions. Mr. Mills is fully equipped with the ripe experience gained from thirty years of active and successful work as secretary of some of the most prominent live stock shows and state fairs held in the United States. His official connection with a number of the leading live stock breeders' associations has kept him fully informed regarding the advancement made in live stock husbandry in the last quarter-century. The leading national live stock associations, with scarcely an exception, have been active in voluntary efforts to secure his well-merited promotion.

Concerning Mr. Mills' participation in the preliminary part of the work which he is now called upon to complete, Mr. Coburn said in a late letter to the Exposition management recommending his appointment as chief: "I think that in view of his large experience in similar work and his intimate knowledge and sympathy with every step thus far taken in the Department's organization, its plans and high purposes, Charles F. Mills is the most suitable man available for undertaking the work at the present stage. His tireless industry and infinite tact are assets likewise not to be overlooked."

Colonel Mills' services at the Chicago World's Fair were highly appreciated both by exhibitors and the exposition officials, and were summed up by Chief W. I. Buchanan long after the close of the Columbian in the following extract from a letter mailed to Mr. Mills: "I can say to you very frankly that from my present point of view I do not understand how it would have been possible to accomplish what we did without your valuable aid and assistance." Hon. H.N. Higinbotham, who was president of the Columbian Exposition, evidenced his great esteem for an interest in Mr. Coburn's successor by a strong voluntary letter to the St. Louis World's Fair management urging the appointment of Colonel Mills.

Chief Mills is now vigorously forwarding all matters pertaining to the live stock show of the Universal Exposition and much can be expected from his deep interest in the work and his superior executive ability.

The unsought appointment of Colonel Mills as secretary of the department eighteen months since was highly complimentary, but not more so than his later unsolicited advancement to the head of the department.

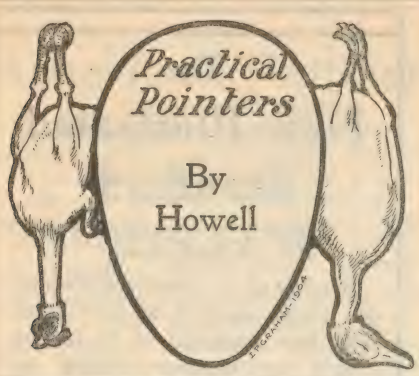
FEATHER-EATING FOWLS.



A practice that causes a good deal of trouble in some poultry yards is that of feather-eating. It is met with more frequently amongst fowls in close and limited quarters than with those that have a large grass range. But whatever may be the object with which the birds are kept—whether for egg production, table purposes, or for the show pen—feather-eating is a most offensive and annoying habit, seriously affecting the appearance and the health of the stock. It is generally commenced by one hen, and if not promptly attended to all the fowls in the yard will soon acquire it, with the result that they will be seen with their heads streaming with blood, most unsightly and disgusting objects. Cure is almost hopeless if it is allowed to go on for any length of time.

Directly it is noticed the offender must be caught and placed in a solitary confinement. She must be fed on a cooling diet, no meat allowed, but plenty of lettuce leaves, or other green vegetables, and some hard grain, such as oats or wheat. The heads of the birds that have been ill-treated should be well washed and cleaned, all short and broken quills extracted, and the place that has been plucked, as well as the surrounding feathers, gently rubbed with carbolised vaseline. Various causes have been suggested for the fowls taking to this habit. Amongst these are overfeeding, lack of occupation, thirst, diet of too heating a nature, and over-crowding.

An insufficient supply of sulphur is also considered to be a reason for feather-eating. Sulphur is an important constituent of feathers. Fowls, when they have a free range, obtain a quantity of sulphur from beetles and other insects, and from the seeds of weeds and vegetable food generally. But poultry in confinement can only procure a very limited supply. It is therefore as well, when feather-eating is going on, to give the birds some sulphur; about a teaspoonful in the soft food to every three fowls twice a week. Sulphur has a laxative effect on the skin or bowels, so it should not be given in cold or wet weather. If the birds are overfed—which can be known by food laying about on the ground after a meal—it is a simple matter to reduce the quantity.

When fowls are cooped up in close quarters there is nothing to occupy them after they have had their meals. They sit huddled up close together, and for amusement pick at one another's plumage until they perhaps acquire a taste for feather-eating. Employment can be found for them in several ways. A cabbage or lettuce may be hung up and tied to the wire, so that they can only reach it by jumping. Or a little loose straw can be scattered on the ground, and a handful of grain thrown in, so that the birds will have to scratch to find it.

A plan largely adopted in America, and in some yards in this country, is to place a daily supply of broken up bones in the run. If much meat, or heating food, has been given, it should be discontinued. Should none of these suggested remedies be of any avail, it is better to kill the culprits, as to keep feather-eating fowls is worse than useless. The practice is more common among some breeds than others. Crested fowls, such as Houdans, are more liable to it than plain-headed birds.—Fanciers' Review, Scotland.

Mr. Howell, associate editor of The American Fancier, will furnish weekly reports on the egg and poultry market, and answer all questions submitted to him relating to commercial and practical poultry keeping. When replies are requested to be sent by letter, stamps must be enclosed and letters addressed to George E. Howell, 70 Christopher St., New York City.

Fowls, 14c; turkeys, 12c per lb.; ducks, per pair, 80 to 90c; live pigeons, 35 to 40c per pair; dressed broilers, Phila fancy, 45 to 50c. per lb.; others, 35 to 45 per lb.; small, 23 to 30c per lb.; fowls, 12½c per lb.; turkeys, 15c per lb; spring ducks, 16½c per lb; frozen turkeys, 19 to 20c per lb.; broilers, 19 to 20c; roasting chickens, fancy, 16 to 17c. per lb; capons, large 20c, small 18c per lb.

Thanks to a very strict pure food law, adulteration and coloring of food products has been greatly lessened Those who insist in spreading oleo on their bread as a substitute for butter will have to take it white; the same with catsup and other table accessories. Whether the law would be violated by coloring the shells of eggs should such a practice become noticeable, time only will tell, but it would seem more safe to change the breed and let them do their own coloring. Such a practice would be about on the part with the fellow who spends five minutes scouring up a stale egg with Sapolio, only to have them tossed out at the end, or if they should deceive the purchaser, perhaps lose him a good customer.

What to do with the cockerels is a bothersome question to most poultry raisers. Sell them at the earliest possible moment and give their room over to the pullets; above all, yard them by themselves. Don't waste a pound of feed on them after you are convinced they have no merit as breeders. Many find it cheaper to buy laying stock rather than raise it. Read the method of Mr. Hayward in the quotation following.

As we are living in the age of big ventures and big hen farms are springing up every day, we quote from the Rural New Yorker parts of a description of the 800 acre hen farm of C. E. L .Hayward, Hancock, N. H., established in 1865 and enlarged until its present proportions were reached.

Filed away at Spruce Farm is a letter from Mr. Hayward received by me when a mere boy, at the time the present business manager of the Rural was on the staff of the Orange County Farmer, and my journalistic aspirations had progressed to the extent of being known as the hen editor of that paper.

In his letter at that time Mr. Hayward describes his plant in much the same general way as it appears in the Rural of to-day, so if his method is original, it is also consistent.

"The six hundred houses are 8x8 ft. and fourteen hens are confined in each, making a total of 8,400 head. Each house is two rods one way and four the other from its neighbor, and are probably the only ones of their kind. Being raised slightly from the ground and double boarded floors, on which a two-inch plank frame fifteen inches high is built, the ridge pole is eight feet from the floor to which the roof boards are nailed, also to the plank at the bottom; the sides and rear are then covered with shingles; two uprights answer for door frame, which is covered with inch mesh wire netting as is also the whole front, no other covering summer or winter. Roosts are put in the rear, two nest boxes, a box for food and another for grit and shell. No range is given and no green food. The stock is sold in the fall and houses filled with pullets raised under contract on farms in Vermont and Canada. 100 eggs per hen is the yield, cost of feeding $1.17 per hen, and profit averages one dollar per hen. The manure fertilizes an orchard which produces 10,000 barrels of fruit."

The reader who aspires to the thousand hen idea will do well to study the above method carefully. While it in no way coincides with the present age idea, the results are there and results always count at the end.. The results in this case are very small individually, collectively they are enormous. The houses and methods are such as would be expected to produce 100 eggs a year. Each hen is not expected to lay until spring approaches; she then is pushed through the summer, and off she goes to market. Not a glimpse of the outside world to encourage an extra egg now and then. On the other hand, no window glass to buy or runs to build with the money from the extra egg.

For the sake of an argument, let us suggest these houses be built 16 ft. deep instead of 8 ft., and a cloth flap to let down at night and stormy days in winter, and 30 hens instead of 14 be put in each house. With one flock to care for instead of two, could not the egg yield be run up to 150 per hen, two-thirds of this increase being laid when eggs are selling for one-third more money?

I am not saying a word about range, as with a flock of this size free range would result in a yearly lost, strayed or stolen item running up into hundreds of dollars.

Sentiment is not on the bill of fare. These hens are mere machines and no careful farmer leaves his machinery out of doors.

The subject of food and stock feeding has advanced to so great a length that the balanced ration is now being attacked, not on the principle of excellence from a scientific point of view, but from the economical side of the question. I suspect if I don't let up on these things you will set me down for a crank,or at best what the learned call an egotist. Not being pecuniarily interested, therefore occupying an unassailable position, I would dearly love to be able to help some fancier improve his position in the poultry world; if some thought of mine as penned in these notes could do it.

As I said before, it has been learned that some highly recommended rations do not yield an increase in production warranting the outlay for such high priced foodstuffs, in other words a ration that cost you four cents extra to buy and only produces two cents extra is wasting money. Now I think you will grasp my meaning and understand why I am again pounding on this subject. When a ration comes to your notice that looks like a winner, try it yourself before finally accepting the word of a college professor—yes, or of a writer in chicken papers.

DOMESTIC DUCKS.

By J. T. Bird.

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.

There are several breeds of domesticated—as distinguished from ornamental wild—ducks which can be remuneratively reared, provided—and this is vital—that the keeper takes a genuine interest in his stock, and works on business lines. Ducks are far more hardy than ordinary fowls, need less care and attention, are in brisk and regular demand, and may be kept on a swampy or wet holding that would be unsuited to the requirements of the ordinary poultry-keeper. Then, again, adult ducks rarely ail anything, ducklings are most easy to rear, and the breeds and colors are varied enough to satisfy any reasonable requirements. Moreover, the breeder of ducks need not confine his efforts to the production of eggs or table birds, since he may strive for show honors, as classes are provided for the main breeds at all poultry exhibitions of consequence. In the old day the only outlet for the energies of the duck-farmer, as distinguished from the duck-fancier, was to rear carcasses for the table, but now that laying breeds of ducks have been brought forward, the duck-farmer has open to him as many avenues for profit-making as has the poultry-farmer.

Before definitely deciding on the breed or breeds that he will keep, the would-be duck-farmer will do well to consider his aims, and the peculiarities of the markets of the district in which his business is to be carried on. The holding itself should be near a railway station, otherwise the duck-farmer will be considerably handicapped at the start. A railway station in the vicinity of the farm means that a market may always be reached, no matter whether table or fancy may be catered for; and, farther, it means that supplies of every description, foods and appliances may be obtained without spending time and money in cartage. The ideal holding for duck-keeping is one that is fairly sheltered, has a south-by-west aspect, and consists of plenty of dry turf interspersed by swamps and tiny streams and ponds. The dry ground is necessary to rear the ducklings upon, and if watered as described is far better than having large sheets of water, because it is in swamps and shallows that natural duck food abounds. Ducks will thrive on a bleak site, but a sheltered one is better, as vegetable and insect life flourishes at times when things would be at a standstill upon a cold situation.

A cheap holding is the best for duck-keeping, and if possible it should be purchased and not rented, because when it is the property of the duck-keeper he can in most cases make permanent improvements that will in the end greatly benefit him. The size of the holding will depend on the scale on which it is intended to conduct operations. Speaking generally, fifteen adult ducks may be kept to the acre, though, of course, the site and quality of the holding must be taken into account when stocking. Rich, sheltered ground will carry more permanent stock than that which is poor and bleak. It is better to have a large area of poor ground, and to stock more thinly, than a small area of richer ground. Poor ground in a good situation soon becomes rich when stocked regularly with ducks, it being surprising how quickly the turf begins to show signs of improvement. They do not scratch like fowls, therefore they do not spoil the turf unless kept so thickly as to poison it by their excrement . Ducks will thrive quite well on short turf, but if the grass be not kept too short they find a lot more natural food, because the longer grass harbors more insect life, and the greater the quantity of this class of food they can pick up the lower can the corn bill be kept. To keep down the turf mowing may be resorted to, or the ground may be grazed. Should large stock not be cared for, rabbits in moveable hutches should be given a trial. The ground, however, will stand constant mowing.

HOUSING.

Ducks should always be housed at night, because although on a suitable range they might be left out all the night, so far as their health is concerned, it is only by housing that the birds can be kept quite safe from all enemies, and the whole of their eggs be secured. Besides, there is a probability that regular housing has much to do with increasing the length of the laying season, and it is only when regularly housed that the birds can be considered under perfect control. The best method of housing ducks is in small houses, each capable of accommodating a drake and four ducks. A house with five feet square of floor room will be found to hold a company comfortably. The houses need not be lofty, 4ft at the highest part being ample. The roof may be either of the span or lean-to pattern, but if of the latter the slope should be towards the back of the house, as this prevents the water from running on to the attendant during rainstorms, when opening or shutting the door or performing similar duties. The houses should face towards the south, and only one half of the front should be boarded, the remainder being wire-netted to ensure light and plenty of fresh air; 2in or smaller mesh netting may be used; 1 inch mesh netting being rat and bird-proof.

If the houses are to be regularly moved, floors are not needed so long as the ground is of a dry character; but should it be wet floors are imperative. Some thing that because ducks delight to paddle about in the mud and water during the daytime, they will not mind sleeping under similar conditions. As a matter of fact, ducks delight to be dry-footed at night, and will not prove fully profitable unless they are humored in this matter. Use secure floors, therefore, unless the ground be quite light in character. They should not rest directly on the ground, but should be raised four inches or so above it; this plan making not only for dryness, but also tending to lengthen the life of the floor. Keep the outside well painted or tarred, the inside clean and well limewashed; use plenty of good, dry litter upon the floor, and the birds will be made comfortable.

Sometimes it may be desired to house the duck stocks in a disused stable or other similar building. When this plan is to be adopted give plenty of fresh air and light, and keep the interior clean and well littered, dividing the floor into sections, each to hold a company. If the birds are kept simply for table the flock may be run together in a roomy building. With the small house a little wired-in run should be used. This may be made cheaply by using 3in. mesh wire-netting 2ft in width, and there is no necessity to cover the top, because the ducks will not mount a 2ft fence. These small runs prove useful when for any reason it becames necessary to confine the birds during the daytime, being much preferable to keeping the birds entirely confined to the house.

Duck-houses are rarely fitted with proper nests, the usual plan followed being to arrange a few bricks on one corner of the floor so as to form a nesting place. Give a little short straw, and no better nest can be had. Some duck-keepers use nest eggs, others do not. Personally, I use a nest-egg because I think that the sight of one encourages the duck to lay at home rather than to try to carry her egg out with her in the morning, a habit many ducks acquire.

When a number of ducklings are reared for stock purposes special houses should be provided for them. Low houses about 20ft in length, and 3ft in width, will hold a score of young birds, and if 2ft, running the entire length of the front, be wires, ample ventilation will be provided.

STOCKING.

The exact plan to follow in stocking depends on whether it is intended to cater for the table, eggs, or both, or to breed for fancy purposes. When table birds are the sole aim, many of the details that are of such importance to the fancier may be left out of consideration. The stock should, however, be of sound constitution, from a good strain, and fairly representative of the breed chosen; while pains should be taken to ensure the sexes being unrelated. When the plan is to go in for show and high-quality breeding, it is advisable to get the best blood obtainable, and if the pocket will stand it, to invest in one or more well-known winners. When buying this class of birds each should be seen before bargained for, since, if possible when making up pens with the object of breeding first-class fancy birds, nothing should be left to chance.

The time to buy ducks for stock is during the autumn. because then there are plenty of birds for sale, and it is also the right time to introduce the birds to new surroundings, as they can become well settled before commencing to lay. Should the aim be eggs only, laying breeds may be purchased in August, for they will come on to lay about October, according to the time that they were hatched. Only young birds should be bought, for although ducks will live and breed for a number of years, the younger the birds the better do they lay, and the earlier in the season do they begin. With drakes this rule need not be so strictly adhered to. Should it not be possibly to personally inspect birds before asking the price and state requirements—as when birds are purchased by advertisement from a distance—be careful to have them on approval, by taking advantage of "the deposit system".

When a bird has come a journey give it its liberty as soon as possible. Turn it down in a small enclosure, away from other ducks, and give it food and water. Remember that a bird that has been knocked about in a small hamper will look far different from its normal appearance, and make allowances accordingly. Many turn their purchases, if satisfactory, among other stock right away, but this is to strongly deprecated. For one thing, the birds need a complete rest, for twenty-four hours at least, after their journey, and to turn them down amid strangers means excitement instead of rest. But the most important point is to make sure that strange birds are healthy before mixing them with others, for should disease be introduced, its eradication will prove a much more serious matter than the slight trouble of isolating the birds for a week or so at the start.

When the stock has all been purchased, sorted out, and the pens made up, take a quiet walk round and see if any improvement can be made. If so, set about it without delay; if not, let well alone. It occasionally happens that a bird has faults or peculiarities that, at first overlooked, may be seen when the birds get settled down into regular quarters and habits.

So far as the prices are concerned, it is to the advantage of the buyer to purchase in quantity, for he will be able to buy a dozen or more ducks from one man more cheaply than if he purchased each duck from the separate breeder,and there may be also a slight gain in the carriage should the birds have to be sent home by rail.

When full stock has been satisfactorily collected, it is as well to remember that the duck-keeper is just at the beginning of his business, and that to keep his stock up to concert pitch, so speak, it is necessary to steadily introduce new blood, and to strive to increase good points, and to eradicate bad ones.—Poultry England.

THE GROWTH OF THE CHICK.

By C. J. Davies.

Although the hatching season is, in the leading showyards at any rate, practically over, a brief description of the early development of the embryo chick may not be without interest to rearers who are still anxiously watching the growth of the season's birds. The comparative ease with which a superficial study of the embryology of the bird can be carried out makes this branch of natural science particularly fascinating, and the breeder may be tempted, now the year is advanced, to sacrifice a few eggs in the pursuit of knowledge.

As everyone knows. the time taken by the single cell to develop into a complete chicken is about twenty days. Before entering into details of development, however, it will be necessary to give a brief description of the egg or ovum itself.

To commence with we have externally the shell, which is sufficiently porous to allow of interchange of gases, and through which the growing embryo breathes. Hence the importance of pure air in the incubator, and the necessity for the hatching chamber being so constructed as to be completely free from lamp fumes. Bad air, or insufficient fresh air, is probably the cause of a very large proportion of the deaths in the shell among eggs placed in incubators; furthermore, it is a curious fact that the longer (in reason) the eggs are aired daily the stronger will the chicks be, particularly if the increased airing is begun with the second week, and carried from then till the end of incubation, when the respiration of the almost complete chicken is naturally increasing in intensity. Lining the shell is a double membrane, which, at the broad end of the egg separates, thus making the space known as the air-chamber. This air-chamber, by-the-by, is not present in perfectly fresh eggs, but only appears and increases in size as the white decreases from evaporation Next we come to the white or albumen, and we shall find two coiled layers of denser albumen, called the chalazae, running from the two ends of the egg to the yolk, which act as elastic pads to keep the latter in position and minimize jars.

The yolk is enclosed in a thin membrane, and appears uniform to the naked eye. A small white disc will be apparent immediately under the membrane, and always uppermost whatever be the position of the egg. This is the germinal spot or blastoderm, which, during incubation, is converted into the complex organism of the chicken. The yolk alone constitutes the true ovum, and is the material which supplies the nourishment necessary to the development of the bird. The albumen or white is also absorbed as the growth proceeds, chiefly by the yolk-sac, but partly by one of the foetal appendages. It must be added that when the egg is laid and becomes cold, all changes incident to further development of the blastoderm practically cease until an increase of temperature takes place. In very hot weather change may continue to a certain extent after laying.

At the end of about twenty-four hours from the commencement of incubation, the embryo will exhibit distinct indications of ribs, and the tubular canal, which will eventually contain the spinal cord, will be partially formed, the whole embryo being oblong in shape with a definite head. Growth proceeds rapidly, and at the end of the second day indication of eyes appear; the head is distinct; the embryo commences to fold itself; a tubular heart is formed; and circulation, or the branching of numerous blood vessels over the yolk-sac, is established.

The third day is the most eventful in the embryonic life of the chick, as during it the rudiments of so many important organs make their appearance. The white is much diminished, owing, it is believed, to its absorption by the yolk, which is in its turn absorbed by the blood vessels. Among the most important changes which take place is the increase of the folding of, and the entire change in the position of the embryo. Up to this time it has been lying mouth downwards, so to speak, on the yolk. It now turns round so as to lie on its left side. Rudiments of all the principal organs are visible, and a very important accessory known as the allantois, which plays the part of a lung or breathing organ, commences to develop. At the end of the fourth day the embryo will have grown considerably larger, and the white will have still farther diminished. The body will be more flexed, and bud-like growths will indicate the future limbs.

The fifth day is marked by the growth of the allantois, also by the apearance of knee and elbow, and of the cartilages, which precede the limbs and digits; but it is not until the sixth day that distinct avian characters make their apearance. Differ as does the adult bird from the mammal, yet up to this time the embryo of the former possesses no distinctive features by which it can be differentiated. For the first time the nose begins to develop into a beak, the stomach takes the form of a gizzard; and other characteristics become distinctly bird-like. Thence onwards the organs, the rudiments of which are all present, simply continue to grow until they have reached the limit of growth in the embryonic state. Movements of the limbs are perceptible as early as the sixth day on opening the egg, but they can be very slight up to the fourteenth day, as the embryo still retains the position in which it was first formed with its body at right angles to the long axis of the egg, and the broad end of the egg on the left side of it.

On the fourteenth day the chick moves so as to lie lengthways in the egg, with its beak close to the inner wall of the ever-increasing air-chamber. On about the nineteenth day the yolk-sac, now greatly diminished in bulk, is drawn into the abdominal cavity. On about the twentieth day the beak is thrust through the membranes, and the bird breathes the air of the chamber, pulmonary circulation commences, blood ceases to flow through the umbilical arteries, the allantois shrivels,and the chick,piercing the shell with repeated blows of its beak,casts off the dried remnants of its enveloing tunis, and steps into the world.

From the above very brief description of a somewhat complex subject, it will be seen that the chick passes through more than one particularly critical period. Up to the sixth or seventh day growth is extremely rapid, and it is possibly during some important change, such as turning on the third day, that the weakly embryo dies,and the egg becomes what we call "addled." Numbers of incubator chickens die in the shell when apparently fully developed. This may be due to either one or a number of causes. First and foremost comes bad or insufficient air, already mentioned as a probable cause of failure at any stage of incubation. If the air in the air-chamber is vitiated when the bird pierces the inner membrane, the lung circulation may probably be unable to establish itself, and the bird dies. In an incubator containing, say, fifty or more eggs, all containing embryos at the same stage of development, a vitiated atmosphere is an extremely likely contingency, not necessarily from lamp fumes, but from the respiration of the birds themselves. Another critical period may be the turning on the fourteenth day; and a still more probable cause of death in a weakly chicken may be inability to draw the yolk-sac into the abdominal cavity. I am most in favour, however, of the first mentioned theory as the cause of death in the shell, and would recommend all poultry-keepers who suffer such losses to pay more attention to the supply of fresh air allowed to the eggs. Fear of forgetting to shut the drawer of the incubator, if the owner goes away from it, deters many from leaving it open for a sufficiently long time towards the end of the period of incubation; but the embryo chick is wonderfully hardy in some respects, and in many instances no ultimate harm beyond a day or two's delay in hatching has resulted from such an accident.

Incubators should always be placed on a ground floor, and on a firm floor, as shaking, such as the machine might be subjected to on the boarded floor of a house of any kind, is extremely likely to kill the embryo at an early stage. Furthermore, loud noises are equally fatal,and I have known a whole hatch destroyed by the careless banging of a door.

A certain amount of moisture, preferably from below, is apparently essential to successful results in hatching, and we cannot do better than as nearly as possible imitate natural conditions in our artificial methods. As to the turning of the eggs, I am not at all sure, in view of the manner of growth of the embryo, that the complete turn twice daily as usually advocated, is as satisfactory as a semi-turn once daily, and at least two airings.—Poultry, England.

THE JUNE AMERICAN BOY.

Starting out with a front cover design representing a healthy looking American boy in the act of throwing a ball over the home plate, the June American boy is replete with matter of interest to wide awake boys, for in addition to the continuation of Kirk Munroe's celebrated story, "The Blue Dragon," and W. J. Roe's "Camps and Campaigns of Washington," there are scores of articles long and short appealing directly to American youth. The stories are: "The Organization of the Barryville Fire Brigade," "Riding the Bucking Broncos of the Sea," "The Rescue" and "The Ranch on the Pecos." Leading articles are "A Yankee boy who became the people's champion," being a brief review of the remarkable career of the late ex-Governor Pingree of Michigan; "Famous Guides of Forest and Stream," "Miss Clara Barton," "A Back Yard Club House," "A School for Choir Boys," "Children of the Chinese Legation," "Growing Peanuts at Home," "New Ways of Travel on Water," "A Famous Boy Fisherman," prize essays on rose growing, "Breeding Cages for Butterflies and other Insects" and "Five Minutes with a few Matches." The last of eight articles on "How to Become Strong" also appears in this number. Best of all is the beginning of a two-part story by Arthur F. Duffey, the world's champion one hundred yard sprinter, telling of his triumphs over old world champions. This is easily the best story on athletics that has ever appeared in The American Boy. This number also contains a splendid article on "The Advantages of Physical Training for Boys" by Dr. George L. Meylan, physical director of Columbia University, New York, and a score of pictures showing the champions of the interscholastic contests held April 23rd last in Philadelphia. The page devoted to The Order of The American Boy contains a variety of company news, while the editor's page, "Just Between Ourselves," answers questions put by boys and particularly such as relate to American Boy Day at the St. Louis Exposition on July 5th. The regular departments of the paper are full of interesting matter. These are, "The Boy Photographer," "American Boy Lyceum, "Money Making and Money Saving," "Puzzles," "Stamps, Coins and Curios," "Book Reviews," and "Home, Church and School." Thirty-two pages, seventy-six illustrations. $1.00 per year. The Sprague Publishing Company, Detroit, Mich.

JONES' COMMENTS.

Page 3 of No. 562 was great. What for?

If "Round-a-bout" devoted one-half inch to the A. P. A. it would be enough. (If anyone wants to know, why write and I will tell them).

If you would use the blue pencil more, readers would like it.

How much does West Point get for advertising Glasgow's games?

The "Dutchman" is pretty fair, but he is no Dutchman. Look at some of his spelling.

If W. P. had not written "laughter" under his conundrum, we would not have known when to laugh. Try again, even if you copy an old one, as you did farther down the column.

The last six notes of W. P.'s are right to the point. Go for them; "I'll hold your bonnet."

Have noticed many times in ads. of winnings at great shows that the parties were never heard of before, much less winning prizes. Or else they do under a "non-de-plume" so they will have something to crawl under if caught.

Seventy-five per cent of prize winners never say a word. They can't advertise—no cash to spare.

"JONES."

If the fowls on the farm had the attention given them that is received by the cows the farmer would soon learn to know more about his flocks and understand how to correct his mistakes. He quickly discovers the reason when a cow fails to give her quota of milk, because he observes her daily, knows what she receives and the conditions under which she is kept. It is not so much the knowledge of cattle as observation of daily occurrences that enables him to keep his cows up to the requirements. The same applies to the fowls. Observe them; learn to know what is necessary to success with poultry, and success will follow as a natural result.—Rural Farmer.

THE ROOSTS.

Roosts for heavy fowls should be wide. A four-inch-wide board one inch thick will be better for large Asiatics as a roost than anything else, but the small breeds will be satisfied with a round pole, or a piece of three-by-four scantling rounded on the edges. The largest breeds prefer to have a support for the breast, as it tires them to hold the weight of the body entirely on the legs.—Farm and Fireside.

KICKED THE BUCKET.

There was a man in Nantucket
That fed his chickens from a bucket,
He mixed bushels of feed
To satisfy their greed,
And now has no hens to cluck it.
—Cacklebury Tales.

EGGS.

If an increase of eggs is desired in the poultry yard before very large sums are expended in the purchase of everlasting layers we would recommend the keeping of no hens after the first, or at most, their second year. Early pullets give the increase, and the only wonder is that people persist as they do in keeping up a stock of old hens, which lay one day and stop three instead of laying three days and stopping one. In some parts of England it is the invariable rule to keep pullets only one year. Feeding will do a great deal—a surprising work, indeed—in the production of eggs, but not when old hens are concerned; they may put on fat but they cannot put down eggs. Their tales are told, their work is over; nothing remains to be done with them but to give them a smell of the kitchen fire, and the sooner they get that the better for all parties. Of course there are some old favorites whose lives can be spared as long as they can send forth their representatives. Judicious mating, by which we mean the advantage of a youthful cockerel, may be the means of even exhibition poultry making their appearance from the eggs of a good hen, and here we have the exception to the rule upon which we insist.—London Agricultural Gazette.

EVERY CHICKEN FANCIER, professional and amateur, will need the new Standard of Perfection. Beautifully illustrated, handsomely bound and printed. Price $1.50. Free to those who send two dollars for two new subscriptions to the American Fancier.

BARRED AND BUFF ROCKS.

I have won the past season at the following shows: Fitchburg, Mass., Stamford, Conn., South Framingham, Mass., Manchester, N. H., New Bedford, Mass. The above Barred Cockerels were all sired by 3d cockerel, 1903, Madison Square Garden, New York winner, 63 cockerels in this class. Reliable Poultry Journal February, 1903, liked this cockerel above all others in the show. I have a few cockerels sired by above cockerel for sale from $4.00 upwards. Standard weight of very even color, barred well all over. If you want to improve your blood these cockerels are what you want. Money returned if birds don't suit you. I have had my pens mated up by one of the leading Poultry Judges in America—4 pens headed by high scoring cockerels. I have also one pen of Buff Rocks. For the cockerel in this pen and two pullets I gave Mr. Higgins, of Orange, Mass., $75. I have not many sittings to dispose of therefore have your orders booked early. My eggs will be from same pens as I breed from myself. Choicest Eggs $2.00 a sitting.

GEYER'S SCURVY CURE FOR POULTRY was the first article introduced to the public for this purpose, which has been thoroughly tested in the last ten years by many of our brother fanciers who are willing to say with us that there is no other article on the market like this that can be relied on to do its work properly. It is something that the poultry fancier, who appreciates his fine birds, needs very much. What looks more disgraceful than a fine flock of chickens, many, or all of them, having their legs coated with a thick, hard, scabby crust which is called scurvy? It spoils the appearance of the birds and is very annoying to them. It is also contagious. Here we have a sure cure for this ugly disease. By following the directions we guarantee that it will take off that ugly, hard coat and leave the legs clean and smooth and give them their natural color. It also has no equal for healing sores and frosted combs and wattels. It makes them very bright and red. It is just what the exhibitor wants to prepare his birds for the exhibition room. Some of our customers tell us that they have tried it with good results for weak legs. We only ask you to give it a trial. It is put up in tin boxes. Money must accompany all orders. Price, 25 cents. Address, G. A. Geyer, Florin, Pa. 560tf

By Using Geyer's Champion Disinfectant & Vermin Destroyer

There are, in all classes of powders before the public, many calculated for the sure cure of lice and vermin and a dozen other purposes, yet are they reliable, and have they produced the results claimed?

In offering this compound, we offer a powder such as is not before the public, and fills a place that none other can for the purpose intended—a positive, sure disinfectant and destroyer of all vermin that invests either poultry, small animals, those of the barn yard.

It is a perfect destroyer of all disease germs, and produces a healthy odor wherever distributed. It is a sure cure for gapes, in young chicks.

If you are skeptical and don't believe in Powders or compouud because of many worthless ones on the market, we ask, please cast aside your prejudice and give this compound a trial. It is put up in 2 pound boxes. Price 25c. 560tf

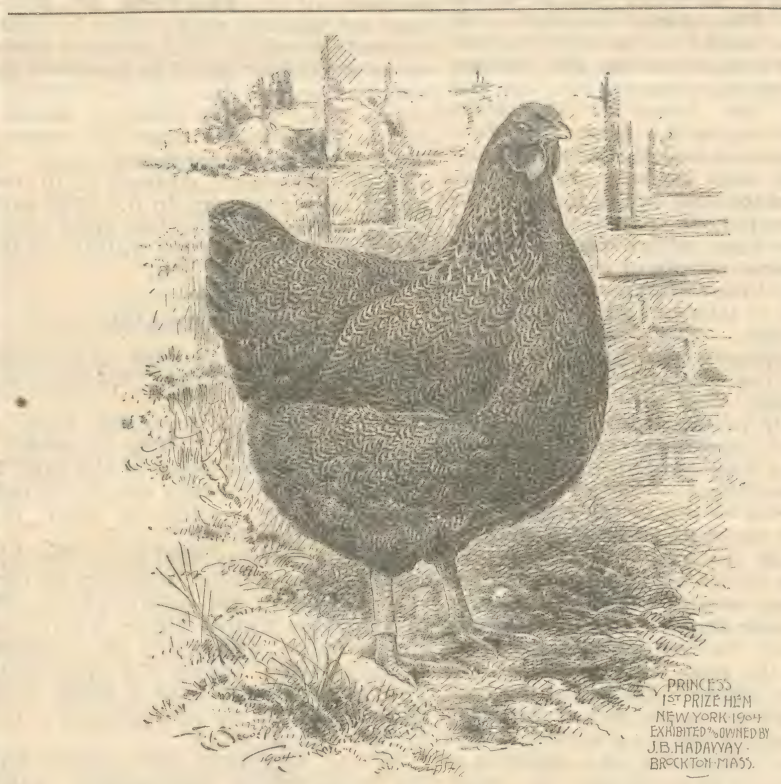
ROUEN DUCKS

The Handsomest and Most Valuable of All.



From the name given to this variety of the duck family, it is commonly supposed that it originated near the city of Rouen in Normandy. But this is another of those cases in which the name given directly misleads. Large numbers of ducks are bred on the banks of the lower Seine, and amongst them there are often to be found those with plumage like that of the Mallard or wild duck. It is the case that at one time some of these were introduced into England, and as this variety is called the Canard de Rouen or Rouen duck, in France, the nomenclature was adopted without further question. Whether that is so or not, the name is erroneous, so far as it would show that the variety originated at Rouen. The more probable explanation is that it is a mere variation of another term. Upon this point we learn from one of the latter editions of Moubray's "Practical Treatise" that "the Rouen variety is known by several names—as Rhone from that department in France; Rohan, after the cardinal of that name; and Roan, a word signifying (according to Bailey) a bay, black or sorrel color, intermxed with grey, the derivation he gives being the French word rouen, which not inaptly described the shades of brown and grey plumage in which ducks of this variety are almost uniformly clothed, and will not this last at once explain the origin of the name of Rouen, by which it is more correctly or at least more generally designated. Although from the fact of our receiving the principal supplies of this stock from France, many writers have supposed that its appellation is taken from the town of Rouen, and certainly fowls of this variety were formerly much sought after in that place for our markets, but notwithstanding that they partook of the general superiority for which the poultry produce of the wives of Normandy are justly noted, they nevertheless in no way differed from the same variety found in other parts of the continent." Another suggestion is that the name is a corruption of the term "rowan," as applied to fields kept up till after Michaelmas, in order that the corn might sprout into green . But we think it more likely the fact of large birds of this variety having been brought over from Normany, and that it is called there the "Rouen" duck, is sufficient to account for its name. That it is specially peculiar to France is incorrect, for many of our best birds are descendants of wild ducks which have been domesticated. And as the wild duck is found in all parts of Europe, and the plan of taming it followed for more than twenty centuries, no country can claim the honor of its origin.

Some of the older writers speak of the Rouen as being the common duck of the country, whilst others give this position to the Aylesbury. Dixon, in "Ornamental and Domestic Poultry" (1848), says: "Of mottled and pied sorts there exists a great variety, black and white, brown and white, lightly speckled and many other mixtures. The Rouen duck of poultry books can hardly be separated from this miscellaneous rabble, and ought to be permitted to return to its original obscurity in the multitude," which shows that Rouen ducks were either very poor in his day or that he did not know anything about them. In the first edition of Moubray we find that "the only variety of common duck among us is the Rhone duck, imported from France, generally of a dark colored plumage, large size and supposed to improve our breed. They are of darker flesh than the English ducks, but somewhat coarse. Rhone ducks have been so constantly imported for a great number of years that they are generally mixed with our native breed."

Amongst those who keep ducks for exhibition the Rouen is certainly chief favorite. This is scarcely surprising when the variety of markings, richness of color and large size to which specimens attain are considered. Some of the classes seen at important shows are simply enormous, in which may come so near alike in quality that only by rigid adherence to the canons laid down can selections be fairly made. The value of this breed in economic qualities is very great, but it cannot compete with the Aylesbury so far as early marketing is concerned. It is much slower in development, and during the early weeks of its life is engaged more in the making of frame than of flesh, but it grows to a larger size than is ever reached by the Aylesbury. It is chiefly used for the breeding of late ducklings and for supplying ducks in the autumn and winter. The flesh is excellent, very full in flavor and when the duck is fully grown very abundant. As showing the size to which these birds can be bred, at one of the Birmingham shows a pair of adult Rouens was exhibited weighing twenty-three pounds ten ounces.

In appearance the Rouen is very handsome indeed, and the drake's richness of color, added to the variety of markings, makes him the most beautiful of our larger varieties of water fowl. Mr. W. J. Riley, a well-known judge, writing some years ago said that the general shape of the Rouen should be deep and massive; the head large an dwell shaped, rather snaky in appearance; the bill large and flat, tapering gradually, and almost in a line with the top of the skull; totally different to the short ,thick beak of the Pekin; the neck is of moderate length and gracefully carried; back nicely arched and broad; keel deep as possible and very event, i. e., as deep in front as behind. Deep-keeled ducks are none too many.

Like the Mallard or wild duck the Rouen drake adopts in summer a garb resembling that of his mate; for it is characteristic of all the colored varieties of ducks that the drake has the richer plumage, the ducks being usually very sombre and homely. The description of the duck given below may be taken for that of the drake in summer, but at other seasons of the year he has a very different appearance. When in full plumage the head must be a rich metallic puplish green, exhibiting different shades with every motion; the eye a deep brown, almost black, small and intelligent bill a very pale yellowish green, not yellow, tipped with a black bean. A band of pure white encircles two-thirds of the neck, and the green should not extend a single feather below this, either behind or in front; the ring, as it is called, should be well defined, and about a quarter of an inch wide, as a wide ring is regarded as very objectionable.

PARTRIDGE WYANDOTTE HEN.
Exhibited by J. B. Hadaway. Brockton, Mass.

Coming to the body we find that the breast is a deep claret of the richest color, and free from what is known as chain armor, or the claret feathers running white round the edge; the edge of the white ring at east side of the breast should be in an exact perpendicular line with the edge of the claret, the latter being well defined and not mixed with the water feathers. Behind this ring and joining the green of the head the feathers should be a very dark grey, running into a deep lustrous green down the back, and terminating in two curled feathers, which are characteristic of all drakes. This green is several shades darker than that on the head.

The wing feathers are a very deep grey, with a distinct ribbon of purple-green, bordered with narrow bands of white and black striking across them. The tail is dark brown or black, the latter preferred. The underneath of water feathers are a beautiful French grey, minute wavy brown lines running across, giving a most pleasing appearance. This grey color, which should be even and free from brown feathers, extends almost to the root of the tail, a crescent of very dark fluffy feathers fitting under the latter. The legs are thick and strong and a very bright, dark orange, toe nails black.

The duck in shaps resembles her mate, though generally and naturally deeper in keel. The head is of a dark brown or chocolate, on the top shading higher into the throat, but a really light-throated duck is objected to; two dark lines extend from the bill to the eye, and from thence into the neck, give the duck a striking appearance. The eye is rather lighter than that of the drake. The bill, which is an important point, should be of a rich dark orange, with a saddle or splash of black on the upper part. This splash should be black on the top, but should not touch the edge of the bill, the ground color of orange being distinctly visible at the edge. It should also not be too large. The breast, flank, back and general plumage are light chocolate or clay color, distinctly pencilled with a deeper shade; the breast is generally lighter than the rest of the plumage, but a dark or "sooty" duck is regarded as being very objectionable. The wing shows a ribbon similar to that on the drake, but the white band on it must not be too deep. The legs and feet are like the drake. Wings in both drakes and ducks must be tightly carried but never crossed over the back—a fault which appears to be more apparent in some strains than in others. Rouens do best with freedom, and where they can have this they do well. They are of little use for killing until well grown, and as we have already said, are better for supplying the autumnal winter markets than for the spring trade. They are prolific layers of large,pale-green eggs, and the young in down are brown and yellow, with yellow legs.—E. B. England.

THE GAPEWORM PEST.

One of the Greatest Trials of the Poultry Raiser.

Of all the trials that poultry raisers have to contend with the gapeworm is the most exasperating. After contending with all the little details necessary for successful incubation, and then, when the chicks are a few weeks old, thrifty and sprightly, to have them die off by the dozen with gapes, is, indeed, a serious disappointment.

The many "sure cures" that are recommended may sometimes fit some cases, may bring occasionally a degree of relief. But in most instances, unless the remedy proposed is quite as dangerous to the chicks as to the gapeworm, the "sure cure" is comparatively a failure.

There are some people who claim that with one or two hairs from the mane or tail of a horse doubled and twisted, forming a loop at the end and passed down the windpipe of the affected chick, they can by a "simple twist" draw up all the gapeworms. Persons who claim they "can do it every time" hardly ever give you an actual illustration by a demonstration. They simply tell you how easily they have done it.

There are others who claim that a piece of asafetida, about half the size of a grain of wheat, given to each little chick as soon as it gives evidence of gapeworm trouble will soon kill the gapeworms in their windpipes. Others declare they have made cures with camphor gum administered in about the same quantity. Another says that putting lumps of asafetida the size of a grain of corn in little muslin bags and suspending them in the vessels containing the drinking water will greatly aid in keeping down the pest. Then there is the method of having a hot iron in one corner of the box (with wire netting over it so the chicks cannot get on it) on which carbolic acid is dropped. The chicks troubled with gapes are placed in the box, the carbolic acid dropped on the hot iron and a bag is quickly thrown over the box to keep the fumes in. The chicks have to breathe the fumes and "will soon sneeze or cough up the worms." Judgment must be used not to keep the chicks too long in the fumes.

Another plan is to put chicks in a box, cover them with a coarse bag and sift a liberal supply of strong (fresh) air-slaked lime through on them, causing them to inhale the lime dust until they cough. Still another "sure" thing which one man says "he" does is to pinch the windpipe and crush the gapeworms. This cure, no doubt, can be done if you are perfectly sure just where the gapeworms are lodged and know just how hard to pinch to kill the pests without overdoing the "cure" and injuring or killing the chicks.

One of the most successful methods for getting the gapeworms from the windpipe is the old-fashioned feather way. Take a stiff wing feather—one of the outer flight feathers—strip the quill of all the feather part except a little at the end. How much of the feather to leave on the end of the quill should depend on the size of the chick to be operated on, for it should always be borne in mind that the windpipe of young chicks is small and the membrane exceedingly tender. Dip the end of the quill in coal oil, twisting it around so to make as small as possible on the end. Hold the chick with its legs between your knees, facing away from you. With one hand straighten up the neck and open the mouth. In looking down the throat it will be noticed when the chick breathes the windpipe opens, and then the feather should be carefully inserted. Push well down and then with a twisting motion remove it. The gapeworm or worms, if the operation has been successfully performed, will be found adhering to the feather. Ofter the chick will cough or sneeze up others. It is a good plan to give after the operation some scalded meal, in which a little turpentine has been mixed, to give the mess an odor. A little water impregnated with asafetida will answer the same purpose. Destroy all the gape worms "fished up," as well as those coughed up by the chicks.

The cause of the gapeworm is just as much of a mooted question as it was 40 years ago, and the same old certain causes and theories are aired every season. The ground, or angle worm, some authorities declare, is the cause of all the trouble, and others are as sure lice are the gapeworm creators. It seems that on premises where the gapeworm trouble appears a liberal dressing of the runways with fresh air-slaked lime is beneficial and really lessens the number of chicks that are affected.

Early spring, about the time it is known the angleworms begin to come up, is the best time to make the application. Another method is to use sulphuric acid and water. Use a quart of the acid to 20 gallons of water and sprinkle all the runs.

When it is known that the runways are infected with what we might call the bacteria of the gapeworm it is unwise to try to raise chicks there. Changing the runs to grounds not before occupied by poultry has ended the gapeworm trouble, therefore giving substantial evidence that there is such a thing as ground pregnant with an element that causes gapeworms. It is also claimed that new land, where poultry has never before been kept, has caused cases of gapes the first season of its use for the flocks. For this reason there are those who conclude the gapeworm is disseminated from sources and ways that no man yet understands.

It would seem that the gapeworm affords a most prolific source of study for the State agricultural experiment stations. Its cause or origin and what remedies may be used to successfully treat the affected chicks, as well as methods that will also prevent the appearance of the gapeworm, are problems the stations might solve in their scientific research. The ordinary poultry raiser cannot afford to lose time in such researches; has not the conveniences, if he has the scientific knowledge. The stations have the opportunity to make experiments, and if ever the gapeworm mystery is to be solved they alone can do it. Who will be the wizard to bring this great boon to the poultrymen of the world?—G. O. Brown in Baltimore Sun.

CARE OF SWANS.

The following is a copy of a letter sent to Edw. S. Schmid, Washington, D. C.:

National Zoological Park.
Washington, D. C., May 23, 1904.

Answering your letter of the 21st, I have to say that swans are easily fed and require less attention than almost any other birds.

No shelter of any kind is required by these birds during any part of the year, except in the severe winters of the northern United States. There, a simple house, with gable roof, closed on three sides, should be provided. The house should have a wood floor and this should be covered with a little dry hay or straw.

At the Zoological Park swans are fed bread, shelled corn, cabbage, kale, and spinich. The bread is cut into small pieces about one-half inch square, and the vegetables must also be cut small enough to enable the birds to feed easily. To the above may be added a little sand or gravel to assist the digestion. Barley is considered to be very good for these birds, rather less than a pint being given to each swan per day.

Swans, unless they are pinioned, that is, the primaries of one wing kept short, or the primaries removed, by separating them from the wing at the carpal joint, are apt to stray and fly from their inclosures.

Trusting that this information is what you desire, I remain,

Very truly yours,
FRANK BAKER, Supt.

PURVIS POINTERS.

Once more, don't forget to keep the little red mites in subjection.

Keep the poultry house clean during the hot weather, if not at any other time in the year. Whitewash, sulphate of iron solution, carbolic acid solution, or other disinfectants will ward off disease and are cheap and not troublesome to apply.

The weight of opinion is drifting toward dry feeding for growing chicks.

Gather the eggs often during the hot weather, keep them in a cool place and market them as soon as possible.

Give the poultry plenty of grit, but remember that you need grit as well as your fowls, if you would succeed.

Rich yellow yolks may not taste any better than pale buff ones, but most people like the yellow ones and feeding corn will make them.

Do you know that fewer chickens are being hatched this year than usual? This means a good demand for eggs next winter and high prices for good stock.

The Australian laying competition proved that winter eggs were the ones the profits come from. Get your pullets matured so they will begin laying early next winter.

Don't worry about getting the best breed. Try to get the best strain of the breed you like best and then put your efforts into making a better strain of your own.

The good poultryman will know which of his hens are among the best layers, for he will be among them often enough to "spot" those that are on the nest most frequently.

An old gander is a better protector for the young stock in a poultry yard than the best dog. He will be always on hand and always ready to give the intruder a noisy and warlike greeting.

Now is a good time to advertise surplus stock. The poultry breeder can afford to make low prices now and there are numbers of people who would buy if offered special prices at this season.

The bird that will win at the shows next winter is now hatched. It will receive the best of care up to show time. Are you looking for prizes in the future? If so, do not forget that now is the time to make prize winners.

If your young chicks do not have good shade, provide it for them. A low shed with a thick straw roof makes a cool shade, is cheap and may be moved to fresh ground occasionally. Make it large enough to give plenty of room.

When you feel like making a disturbance over the poor hatch you got from a sitting of eggs you bought, stop and consider how much you would have sent the seller if you had happened to get ten prize winners.

The beginner should not try to keep too many fowls at first. Begin with a few and work up to your limit. You may be able to care properly for 100 fowls, or you may be able to give proper attention to 500, but only a trial will fix the limit.

Keep the chicks growing every minute until they are matured. Wheat and cracked corn in equal proportions will make perfect growth if the chicks run at liberty where they can get grass and insects. If they are confined, a little meat feed of some kind and green stuff in abundance will be necessary to best results.

The poultryman who gets tired and feels that he must take a rest and let the poultry take care of itself for a few days often wonders why some people succeed while he fails. There are no Sundays or holidays in taking care of poultry.

Scaly legs are liable to appear with hot weather. Grease the legs of those afflicted with lard, rubbing it in, and the insects that make the trouble will be killed. Give those not afflicted a light greasing occasionally and the trouble will never appear.

After all the talk about table quality, we don't believe any one can distinguish the difference between breeds after the bird is well cooked. A well-finished spring chicken tastes good whether his parents were white, black or brown, or weighed three or ten pounds.

A very profitable kind of a poultryman—for the other fellow—is the one who changes breeds every year or two. Such a "fancier" is always going some place and never gets there. The men who have made money and fame have stuck to their breeds year after year.

The reason it is too hard to do a sick chicken any good it that everything that goes down its throat must first pass through the crop and then on to the digestive organs. When a chicken gets sick the crop stops working and medicine stops, without going further, and does not reach the seat of the disease.

Let one person take care of the poultry all the time, if possible. Henry Van Dreser told the writer that he could, by giving his hens one good scare, reduce the egg production 10 per cent. If fowls are always cared for by the same person they become familiar with their keeper and going among them by him does not disturb them.

Poultry droppings, while not nearly as valuable as guano or other commercial fertilizers, are well worth saving. If the dropping boards are well covered with dry earth or sand and cleaned frequently the mixture makes a very valuable fertilizer for gardens and lawns, especially lawns, as it may be raked down among the grass roots and will sink from sight through being dissolved and washed into the soil by rains.

A word to beginners: Don't expect to get a flock of prize winners from two sittings of eggs. Don't expect to become a famous fancier in a year or two. Don't expect many orders for eggs until the public knows that you know a good fowl and you have proved it by showing good ones. Go in to win, but don't expect to win the first time you appear in public. Select the breed you like best and promise yourself to make it better every year you keep it, and that you will stick to the business.—Miller Purvis in Poultry Herald.

MUSLIN FRONTS FOR HOUSES.

I have read with interest your article on muslin curtains in place of glass windows in poultry houses. The advice given is good, and the statements made are very important to poultrymen, bu tthe philosophic principle is not stated. Every poultryman of experience will agree as to the importance of keeping dry housesfi and as to the fact that damp houses promote colds, roup and kindred diseases in fowls, and thereby ruin the egg crop and demoralize the business generally.

Most of us have had trouble with damp cellars, and the cause and prevention have been given many times in the agricultural papers. A cellar which is thrown open to the heated air of a summer day and closed at night will be damp, or will show dampness on the walls; this is because the warm air of midday holds in suspension more water than the cold air of the night can hold, and as soon as the air cools down at night the water in suspension must be deposited. Adopt the opposite course—close your cellar doors and windows in day time, and open up to the cool air of the night, and your cellar will be dry.

Now this principle borne in mind enables us always to protect our fowls from dampness. The usual condition is that the atmosphere is warmer in the daytime; the sun shining in the windows warms up the house closed in with glass. The moisture held in suspension in such an atmosphere must be deposited on walls and interior surfaces when the atmosphere cools down at night. As the temperature goes below the freezing point, this moisture is congealed, to be melted again when the warmth of next day's sun comes on it. This is repeated with each 24 hours in a house which is closed from the drying effects of the outside air until the whole interior is reeking with moisture.

By adopting the muslin curtains, the houses are kept cooler in day time and the temperature more nearly the same through the 24 hours. The air circulates through the certains, drying out the interiors, as well as ventilating them, thus disseminating and taking care of the moisture which is given out from the breath of fowls, and by evaporation from drinking vessels, etc.

The fowls when exercising through the daylight hours, do not require as much heat as when sitting quietly on their perches at night. This warmer condition at night is properly provided by the curtainede enclosure for th roosts.

I have particularly noted all these conditions in our poultry houses. We have four houses without muslin fronts, but our first houses were built with them; the roosting places are enclosed and made warm in all of them—some have straw overhead, others have not. One of our managers was, during his incumbency, utterly unable to keep dry the four houses without muslin fronts, but had no difficulty in keeping the others dry. Our present manager keeps them all dry, and he does it by observing the principle of of keeping the fowls comfortable at night by curtained roosts, and opening up the general house to the outside atmosphere during the daytime to such en extent that it gets but little warmer in day time than at night.

The roosting apartments in most of our houses are built with an air space, tarred paper inside and outside, covered on inside with tongued and grooved ceiling boards, and on outside with either siding or tongued and grooved boards. These conditions are extended to the roof as well as the side walls. The scratching sheds are made by one thickness of siding and lined with tarred paper, and we would consider it a waste of material to make these walls of the scratching sheds with air spaces. The whole of the fronts of these sheds are door frames, made of roofing lath, covered with heavy muslin, and swinging up to the ceiling when not needed.

During the past winter, when the thermometer registered from 12 deg. to 22 below zero for days at a time, warm water had to be supplied two or three times daily for drinking, and the conditions for egg-laying were most unfavorable, but the hens never gave us less than 100 eggs daily.—F. J. Bell in Country Gentleman.

THE DETROIT SHOW.

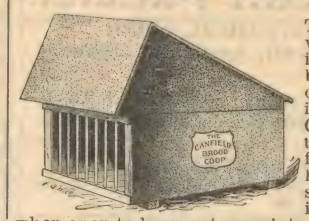
The International Poultry,Pigeon and Pet Stock club of Detroit, Mich., have elected the following officers for the ensuing year: President, W. A. Jones; vice presidents, Jno. R. Wood, J. C. Edwards; secretary, S. Z. Harroun; treasurer, C. H. Royce.

Arrangements are well under way for our second annual show, which will be held in the Light Infantry armory, January 12th to 19th, inclusive, 1905, with score card judging.

Judge Thos. F. Rigg has been re-engaged, other judges to be announced. The club will continue the policy inaugurated last season: Uniform cooping, liberal cash premiums, early completion of judging, prompt display of ribbons, and positive payment of premiums before close of show.

Breeding pens, cooped together, will again be a feature. The dates chosen should be appreciated by exhibitors, as they can ship and return birds without danger of a Sunday hold-up en route.

Each exhibitor's birds will be cooped together, in groups, regardless of classification; an advantage to exhibitors that cannot be questioned.



No effort will be spared to advance the interest of exhibitors and to attract a large attendance of visitors.

Watch for future announcements.

SATURDAY, JUNE 25, 1904.

The illustration of a Partridge Wyandotte hen on our title page, presents a faithful picture by Sewell, of a beautiful specimen of a very handsome variety of the Wyandotte breed. In pencilling, color and shape, this bird is a model, and her owner is justly proud of her, a fact that not only spurs him on to greater efforts in behalf of this breed, but in the determination to keep it in the front rank. Mr. Hadaway has been very generous and liberal in helping the Partridge Wyandotte club, and to him much credit is due for the big specialty show to be held at Brockton, Mass., next winter.

We regret to learn that Harry M. Lamon, Watertown, N. Y., is about to give up the chicken fancy, owing to other important business matters that will take up all of his time in the future. It is a hard parting for Harry, for if ever a chicken crank was intense, Mr. Lamon was Signor Intense from Intenseville. His Buff Leghorns are famous and have been great factors in bringing that fine breed to the front; his Barred Rocks are "bred in the purple" and represent the best blood in America. But all must go. Here is a glorious chance for some enterprising fancier to get a start in business seldom offered.

The annual clambake of the Adirondack Poultry club is one of the great features in the list of summer outings at Johnstown and its suburbs. It will be held at Cayadutta Park, August 17. An innovation will be the serving of spring chickens a la Eisenmann. This service is considered about the best method of preparing choice chickens for the table, being an improvement on the famous Maryland style. But the old club is bound to be a leader in everything "appertainin' to" chickens.

Mr. Arthur O. Schilling, Rochester, N. Y., corrects our statement regarding Buff Cochin Bantam pullets, illustrated in our June 11 issue, as follows: "This pullet was bred by me and sired by my second New York cockerel (1903). I won with her at Toronto, Rochester and New York, and sold her to John F. Homeyer after the Rochester show." We are glad to make the above, as it is no fault of Mr. Homeyer. The mistake was ours.

The annual meeting of the American Poultry Association next winter has not attracted any particular attention, owing to the fact that the work of Standard Revision has been completed and no "burning issues" of the day are liable to come before the next gathering of the class.

Invitations have been extended to the American Poultry Association to meet at New York city and at Minneapolis. The latter city was sidetracked for Rochester in 1904 for business reasons of great importance, and a number who favor the Flour City of the Northwest, voted for the Flower City of the Empire State because of the latter. As a matter of courtesy and as a guarantee of good faith, the next meeting of the American Poultry Association should be held at Minneapolis, and no doubt the votes sent in will decide that way.

Personally, we have been of the opinion that the annual meetings of the American Poultry Association should be held in the same place every year, and not in connection with any poultry show. We do not beieve in the American Poultry Association being used as an advertising proposition in connection with any show. The evil results of this are patent to every member that cares to consider them. When men advertise world's champions at A. P. A. shows it is time to draw the lines, and draw them so tight that somebody will get choked. There is too much humbug, too much downright lying in advertisements of this kind and the easiest way out of it is: Remove the opportunity.

The American Poultry Association meets once a year to transact business and not to furnish advertising ammunition to the foxy gents that only join the old society for revenue. And one of the great wheels that revolve in just such a direction is the holding of adjourned meetings at some big fall shows. What for? The answer is obvious.

With annual meetings, however, there is justice in recognizing spots and places that show decided interest in thoroughbred poultry culture, and as long as the swinging around the circle is the rule, we see no reason why the great northwest should not be favored with the next annual. It is equally, perhaps more deserving, than some of the places selected in the past.

As to New York city, it is the metropolis of America, has its famed Madison Square Garden show, held two successful meetings of the American Poultry Association there in the past decade, and can well afford to allow the next annual to speed "Westward Ho."

The June Inland Poultry Journal came to our desk as bright and clean as a newly unfolded rose. The calm of its editorial pages was soothing and only the justifiable calling down of a "shark" advertiser disturbed the placid sea. It was only an "eddy," but a very strong one at that. Bro. Hewes, we congratulate you. You are getting out too good a paper to waste your strength on hammering away at a mark you cannot dent, bend or break without suffering the natural recoil such exertion invites.

Keep on hatching chickens. Modern methods, feeding and appliances make all seasons look alike to the up-to-date poultryman.

Henry Steinmesch, one of the famous committee of "3," has been visiting in New York with his fellow committeeman, T. F. McGrew, and the contract for the cooping of the fowls and pigeons at the World's Fair has virtually been signed. Now let the good work go on.

Grant M. Curtis editor of Reliable Poultry Journal, and president of Cypher's Incubator Co., is on the briny deep, bound for merry England, where he will transact some important business. He will be back before August 1. In the meantime, it will be in order for the warring western poultry editors to take a well earned vacation and allow the chickens and contributors several months' run of the columns of their respective papers.

If General John L. Cost of Hagerstown, Md., imagines he can escape detection while gum-shoeing through New York city enroute for the happy fishing grounds of Long Island Sound, he is mistaken. When Senator "Dave" Nichols, Postmaster "Billy" Holmes and the General get in one catboat and start a fishing, the news spreads from shore to shore and even the tide went out telling strange tales of big catches of fish. Evidently the Costly Fishing Club is taking its outing in sections this year. There is no truth in the rumor that two of the members, "'Georgy" Howard and "Tom" McGrew, have gone to the Chicago stock yards fishing or hunting for pig hockies in order to get a supply for another banquet. Deacon Ruliffson is getting ready for a big trout fishing trip next month in the Adirondacks with several expert anglers and bait carriers from this section. It will be a sort of a costly fishing club, also.

We learn that the new superintendent of Live Stock at St. Louis, Col. Mills, is desirous of having model exhibits in all the departments he controls. Not only model as to class or quality, but in the handling, arranging and showing of the same. Such an aim is worthy of note and of the earnest support of all live stock exhibitors.

The writer of these notes has been at World's Fair functions on a number of occasions, and to be brutally frank, has been disgusted at the miserable accommodations provided for poultry, pigeon and pet stock exhibits. They were a disgrace to civilization and an insult to one of the greatest industries, from a monetary standpoint, in the United States. With the poultry exceeding the wheat products in cool millions, the hens were penned in cattle and sheep buildings, while the wheat sheafs reposed in artistic surroundings in a beautifully designed building.

This brings us back to St. Louis. With Col. Mills' high ideals in broad view, we might reasonably offer a few suggestions that we think the triumvirate, Steinmesch, McGrew and Dishel, will no doubt assist us in making of more or less value in arranging for the gathering of the feathered bipeds at Anheuser-Buschville in October.

Here they go: Why not erect special buildings for poultry, pigeons and pet stock and dogs? These buildings could be sold to State Fair associations after their usefulness at the World's Fair. Such buildings can be constructed cheaply of matched siding, with muslin screen lights on the sides and glass skylights. Wide, long aisles, single tier cooping, painted signs for each variety of every breed tacked or pinned on the cages containing such will instruct the visitors to tell a Brahma from one of "Tom" Orr's Orpingtons. Then shut up the buildings while the judges are at work, get the ribbons up promptly so when the "dear public" fills the aisles, the winners will be known by card or number. It has been done in one day at some of the greatest shows ever held in America, and it should or must be done at St. Louis. We want a model show and we will bet dollars to doughnuts that if Signor Tommaso Orrini of Beaverini, Pennsylvania, is allowed to have full sway, that the above will come to pass, and always bearing in mind, with the assistance of the "Com. of 3."

To Steinmesch, McGrew and Fishel: Please design a model poultry exhibition hall and have it built at St. Louis. The excess in coop fees over the cost of the coopings will do a good part of it and leave the promoters something of the lucre they are deservedly and justly entitled to. Besides, they will do much toward establishing an ideal or model show building.

GUINEA FOWLS FOR PROFIT.

By Aesculapius.

In this age of utilitarianism very few people will embark even upon an experiment in the Fancy direction, unless they can see some profit in it, or at least unless they can see that they will be able to do what they call "make both ends meet." It is generally supposed that Guinea Fowl keeping is not a profitable branch of the poultry industry, or of the poultry fancy. Why this idea should prevail cannot be understood. What poultry keepers certainly do want to bear in mind is, that it is undesirable to attempt too many things; and amongst the undesirable things which ought not to be attempted, is the practice of keeping Guinea Fowls mixed up with ordinary poultry.

Guinea Fowls are very pugilistic in their nature—they interfere, therefore, with ordinary poultry a great deal, and besides this they are tiresome things to keep under control. Living as they do in a semi-wild condition, refusing to be confined in ordinary poultry houses, and wandering off long distances on their own account—they are certainly not to be recommended to anyone who is not possessed of a wide range of land, so that friction with neighbors need not be apprehended. If, however, this wide range of land be available, there is no doubt that Guinea Fowl keeping is very profitable, for the eggs always find a ready sale, even in country markets, at good prices, and besides that, the rearing of Guinea Fowls, like the rearing of turkeys, can be carried on with comparatively little expense, thus ensuring a wide margin of profit. Let not the farmer or fancier, suppose, however, that they can be kept without any expense in the way of attention and care. They need to be looked after well, although when young Guinea Fowls have been hatched out and started well in life, they do not need constant feeding in the same way as chickens do. The natural food of Guinea Fowls is insect life, and in their search after this, they will wander, as has already been said, for long distances, and so long as they can find what they want, they need little other provision, except a feed of corn perhaps once during the day and again at night.

The chickens can be reared under the same conditions as ordinary chickens are reared—care being taken that the hens provided are of small type. There is nothing better than a Silkie hen, for she is light, and a good sitter and brooders.

The feeding can follow the lines of chicken or Pheasant feeding—more nearly Pheasant feeding, because Guinea Fowl chicks like Pheasant chicks need a considerably higher percentage of meat in their food than ordinary chickens do—that being the nearest approach to their natural insect diet. They can of course, be hatched in incubators, and we reared in foster-mothers quite as easily as ordinary chickens can; and many farmers have found it a good and profitable plan not to keep any adult Guinea Fowls at all, but to buy eggs in the open market, hatch them out in incubators, rear the chickens in foster-mothers, and as soon as they are able to take care of themselves turn them out to grow, and kill them all off at the end of the season.

Perhaps after all, this is the best way to begin keeping Guinea Fowls. If you buy full-grown birds, their habits are so wild that the chances are they will be lost, or at least there will be some difficulty in getting them to settle down. This difficulty, of course, is overcome by purchasing eggs and hatching out chicks on the spot. It takes about twenty-eight days, or rather less, to incubate Guinea Fowls' eggs, and the hatching season is about equal in point of time to the Pheasant hatching season. They do not thrive well in bad weather, so that it is not desirable to hatch them out too early. If they are being reared in a foster-mother, they must have regular supplies of green food—there is nothing better than grass chopped up finely—and foods like Indian corn or rice must be withheld, for these things do not help their growth, but rather the reverse. The best meal for feeding them is oatmeal, with fifteen or twenty per cent. of meat. They cannot, of course, be fattened off when they are ready for market in the same way as poultry are fattened in fattening coops; they must be left entirely at liberty until the time comes for them to be marketed.—Fanciers' Gazette, England.

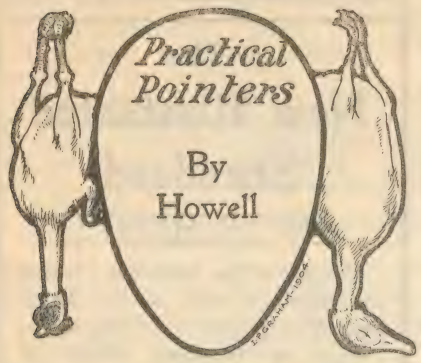
CAYUGA DUCKS.

This duck has been bred so long in this country that all trace of its origin is lost. Tradition says that it descended from a sort of wild duck that stopped in Cayuga and Seneca river on its flight north and south in fall and spring, yet no specimens have been seen which resemble it in weight and color closely. It is sometimes called the Black River Duck, and also the Lake Duck

There existed in England, many years ago, a large, black duck, which, it is said, was closely allied to the Cayuga, if not identical with it. It is probable that a black variety might have sprung from the Mallard, both in England and in this country. This would not, of course, detract at all from America's honor in originating the Cayuga. It is distinctly an American production, and combines, in a marked degree, many excellent qualities, with so few faults, that it is worthy of the fostering care of American breeders. If proper care be taken in the selection of breeding stock; if size be increased and hardiness be maintained, there is reason to believe that there will be a greater demand for this stock at home and abroad.



The Cayuga duck of to-day possesses a glossy, black head, dark, hazel eyes, and a dark or black bill; a gracefully curving neck, clad in black feathers with a greenish lustre; a long, broad back, and a long and finely shaped plump body, both a glossy, black hue; long, well-folded black wings. The primaries of the duck sometimes being a dark brown, and the coverts of the drake a very lustrous green black; the tail feathers black, and black is also preferred for the shanks, although dark slate is permissible. The plumage throughout, when in the best condition, should be glossy black in parts, with green reflections.

The average weight of the Cayuga duck, per pair, is from twelve to fourteen pounds, but, as they fatten readily, they can be made to attain a weight of seventeen or eighteen pounds per pair. By avoiding too close breeding, and carefully selecting specimens for breeding, the Cayuga may be made to weigh as much as the Rouen or Aylesbury.

The Cayuga is extremely hardy, and ranks among the best layers, producing 80 to 90 eggs in the spring, and sometimes laying in the autumn. The flesh of the Cayuga is considered by competent judges to be of the highest quality. Care in feeding must be taken, as it fattens easily, and has a tendency to get down behind.

They are quiet and mild in disposition, rarely able to fly, a two-foot board being sufficient to restrain them.

A. F. P. B.

Mr. Howell, associate editor of The American Fancier, will furnish weekly reports on the egg and poultry market, and answer all questions submitted to him relating to commercial and practical poultry keeping. When replies are requested to be sent by letter, stamps must be enclosed and letters addressed to George E. Howell, 70 Christopher St., New York City.

Eggs.—Receipts for week, 105,000 cases, an increase over last week and a very liberal supply for the time of the year. Market favors the buyer and it is hard to get quotations in a jobbing way. As we proceed in the summer season the quality of offerings decline, really fancy goods demanding the money, and those of indifferent quality going a-begging. We quote: Nearby, fancy, closely graded white, 21c per dozen; mixed colors, 19c; Western, 16 to 18c; Kentucky and other Southern, 12 to 15c; dirties, 13 to 15c; checks, 10c per dozen.

Poultry.—Receipts, 35 cars live, and 7,450 packages dressed; market overloaded, but stock selling fair, especially spring chickens, which are quoted at 22 to 23c per lb. live, and broilers commanding from 23 to 40c per lb. dressed, according to size.

Live fowls, 12½c; turkeys, 12c; ducks, 40 to 60c per pair, south and west sections. Live pigeons, 35 to 40c per pair.

Dressed turkeys, 13 to 15c for best fresh killed stock; fowls, western, dry picked or scalded, 12 to 12½c; ducks, L. I. and eastern, 16c per lb; White Squabs, $2.50 to $2.75 per dozen.

Abnormally large specimens as well as the underweight ones are not particularly an advantage to any flock. Because a hen is lugging around three pounds of fat attached to her insides, it is no criterion of her value as either a breeder or a layer. The hen approaching the standard weight for her family when in good laying condition, having a full business-like development, is the one to take the eye and fill the egg basket. As a table fowl that three pounds of grease will not improve the quality, although it may increase the selling price.

This can happen only with the heavier breeds, that is, those weighing six pounds and over.

Don't feed a horde of lice; it is the most costly practice imaginable. There is no excuse for it. A few moments' time and any one of the fifty lice-killers on the market. For head lice, a little of Armour's lard compound, or if you don't like Armour, use Swift's—they are both "Trust"-worthy.

The New York Sun, in commenting on the chances a young man had to pile up a fortune, blames the farmer's son for leaving the country and seeking a livelihood in the city, more especially as his place at the homestead is being taken by city bred men and foreigners who have migrated to our shores in search of the wealth, prosperity and liberty which has been heralded to every corner of the world.

And strange to say, these same usurpers of our century-old family homesteads are succeeding where the younger generations either fail or refuse the challenge.

The Sun cites instances where city men have made $40,000 raising white onions; another $10,000 a year squab raising. Probably these figures could be reduced one-tenth in actuality, but at that they would be mighty good arguments in favor of the Sun's contention.

A third case is where a young man had worked at the Produce Commission business, and learning the wants of the public started in the chicken business and clears years from 3,000 to 5,000 dollars.

No doubt the city young man, having a better commercial education, profiting by coming in contact with the cold and calculating ways of the city, will drive a better bargain for his products that his country born and brought up neighbor and win out.

It behooves the hen man to look alive in these days. Raising poultry and eggs as a means of livelihood was never in as good a condition as at the present time, and is bound to tempt many people from other walks of life. The new owner of your neighbor's plot of ground may be the young city dude who boarded there the preceding summer, who, having discarded his glad rags, has donned a suit of working clothes and goes in with a determination to succeed that will not be denied. Or it may be an immigrant and his family coming with the fourfold purpose to work, produce, barter and save. Against such competition it will have to be the cry of the street car conductor: "Step lively!"

A chick can be fed on cracked or crushed grain the first week of its existence, at a cost of one and one-half cents, or sumptuously on any of the prepared luxuries at a cost not above two cents each. Now, it is in order to find out the increased cost from week to week; also will a single chick, flock of ten, or one hundred thrive equally and consume as much pro rata, or if there is a difference, how much?

It is hard to reconcile a human being to his lot, even a chicken man will be unsettled in his plans and in doubt about things relating to his pet hobby.

The man with the continuous house will sigh for the isolated houses of his neighbor, while the latter continually tells of his determination should be build against to have all under one roof. The same with hallways; such things are sweet music to the fellow who hasn't them, and the one who has swears he is wearing himself out opening and shutting the gates and doors. Oh, well, we must all be amused, even if it takes a two-hundred foot tramp up and down a hallway every few minutes to do it.

WORD FOR THE AMERICAN POULTRY ASSOCIATION.

We do not suppose that the best friends of the American Poultry Association would claim that it has done all the work it ought really to do.

It is our firm conviction, however, that it has accomplished a great deal more than it is usually given credit for, and many of the criticisms aimed at it are about as far as possible from hte mark.

Its members and all who are interested in the advance of the poultry industry should recognize its defects as well as the good work it has done.

The American Poultry Association is first of all the custodian of the Standard of Perfection. Some captious critics have said that this is all the association has done. We do not admit this, but if the association did nothing more, there would be abundant reason for its existence. Whatever else the association may or ought to do this must remain always its most important work.

And this work it has done, not perfectly, but well. We do not suppose that anyone will seriously deny this. And in this work it is just now taking a long step in advance. We predict that the new Standard will be a work in text and appearance of which every member of the American Poultry Association and every breeder of standard poultry will be proud.

We fear that the importance of the Standard of Perfection is not generally appreciated. Its influence is far wider than its circulation. The majority of the breeders of pure bred poultry, we regret to say, do not own a Standard. Perhaps the majority never saw one, but they feel its influence, nevertheless.

We venture the opinion that if it were not for the Standard the breeding of pure bred poultry would be utterly demoralized. Breeders would simply be at sea.

It is our opinion, moreover, that if the Standard were abolished every poultry market in the country would feel the effects of it adversely in a comparatively short time.

Editor Robinson, of Farm Poultry had a somewhat lengthy editorial in a recent number of his paper, in which he sought to justify his own course, and that of others, in staying outside the American Poultry Association.

He declines to enter the membership of the A. P. A. because it has not done the work he thinks it should have done, and he sees little prospect of improvement. It must be admitted there is ground for some of his strictures upon the association.

But Mr. Robinson's criticism is merely negative after all. If he has something positive to offer, let us have it.

If the American Poultry Association needs to be reformed it should be reformed from within. This seems to us to be self-evident. We think, however, that reformation is not the word that should be used.

The association needs to be strengthened. It needs the help of Editor Robinson and of all who are interested in the great industry which the A. P. A. represents. It needs more earnest work on the part of those who are already members.

And we think it needs a larger vision of its opportunities. We think no member of the association will dissent from this statement.

There is a great deal of work that the association ought to do that it is not doing. But we are not going to outline an ambitious programme of work. If we had such a programme clearly mapped out in our own mind we should not be anxious to spring it.

The American Poultry Association is going to undertake larger work in the future, we believe, but the important thing now is to do well the work just now in hand. This is the only way in which it shall be competent to take up new and larger work later on.

The A. P. A. is growing in strength and power. The completion of the new Standard will mark a red letter period in its history.

But it can never measure up to its full opportunities until it has the active support from the inside of a much larger number of those interested in pure bred poultry.

The association has the field. No other organization will take its place. Editor Robinson and others like him should not wait until it is more worthy of their support before joining it. A long pull, a strong pull, and a pull together is what is needed.

Can we not now have an era of "peace and work?"—Poultry Herald.

BREEDING BUFF ROCKS.

By J. D. Wilson.
President of American Buff Rock Club 1897.

There are, beyond question, a few preliminary matters worthy of a breeder's consideration, when starting out to make up his matings, which will greatly affect the ultimate result to be obtained in the progeny. One is known, that the quality of the hen only affects the quality of her own progeny. The quality of the male affects every hen in the yard with him. This is so well known and established that it would not seem necessary to call attention to it, only that it is so frequently disregarded by comparatively experienced breeders. To be brought to the attention of a breeder at this season may prove of profit to him, so he may not lead to continue being over zealous to economize by purchasing a male not of the very best quality to introduce to the already weak females.

In breeding Buffs the strength of the male cannot be overestimated. It is most important, too, that the quality of the progenitors of the male bird should, for many generations back, be known to have been carefully and intelligently bred, to assure a large percentage of good offsprings from his matings. So I claim that it is necessary and a wise expenditure of money to invest in a really first-class male. You must not lose sight of two important points that are affected more by the male bird than by the females, viz: Color and comb. Although we find both are affected at times by the females, however the male has the greater market influence. So to be really successful one must have these points strongly established in the male to make it really possible to be transformed to their projeny. And, too, the influence of throwing back in breeding appears, which argues strongly in favor of know that the breeding has been on correct lines for generations. At times, apparently a good bird is bred from parents that are very faulty, but the faults are pretty certain to again appear in the offsprings of his matings.

Many breeders have been puzzled to account for the defects they find that were not present on either side, so it seems that the law of nature reasserts itself. I am skeptical about all birds breeding to their like; they may largely approximate it after careful selection for generations on these lines.

The introduction of new blood, or in other words "not related," so that vigor may be obtained, is a very serious and misleading step, if the cross is very abrupt. Your aim being for a correct method to obtain some definite type to perpetuate your birds, avoid crude methods, as they are practically of no value. You will find that all lasting results have been obtained by a certain amount of inbreeding, although I would not advise it being carried too far, as it may lead to sterility with their own family; many times, however, they are found prolific with those of another strain. To ensure success, it appears quite necessary to have both sides somewhat related. In breeding there is one thing you can be sure of; if there is a bad cross in the strain it is certain to crop out. Therein lies the importance of seeing that both sides have been for generations carefully bred from the same strain.

In color, a bird generally has a tendency to breed lighter, so care must be taken in selecting your breeders to keep up the correct color. The male must be selected to represent as perfect a bird as possible, particularly in point of color. Size is not so important at first, as his mates must be large. In such event, the progeny then will be large, as the females have the greatest influence in that direction. In selecting the male, select one with a small, neat comb, also one with a deep bay eye, as that color denotes good constitution, which carries generally a vigirous and spirited appearing bird.

In breeding, I have not lost sight of strengthening their laying and other staple qualities. The beautiful, warm, sun-light covering of their plumage in addition to their superior marketable qualities has gone far towards making them the most popular variety of the most popular breed known to the present day.

It was not until they were exhibited at the World's Fair, '93, that they became prominent. Their creditable appearance there obtained their admission to the American Standard. It has been purely their many points of merit that has gained them an enviable position in the Poultry World.

INCUBATION RULES.

In gathering eggs for setting, be careful not to crack or check them. In cold weather, if hen house is cold, gather three times a day. Do not wash eggs for setting, but keep dirt from them, both in the nests and in handling. The fresher they are, the better they will hatch. Where it is necessary to hold them for more than two days, keep them at a temperature of 45 to 55 degrees, and turn them on the trays once a day. In winter go yourself for the eggs that are to come from any distance, and keep them from the cold and sudden or constant jolting. Shipped eggs should rest 24 hours before being placed in incubator. Eggs from same breed retain a more even heat and hatch better than eggs from different varieties. Do not set any eggs that are unusually large or small, or that are flat, round, ridged or otherwise irregular in shape. Make a test by folding a piece of black blotting paper two feet square about a lantern with reflector and bull's eye chimney. Cut a hole in the paper opposite the bull's eye, not quite the size of a small egg with large end up. Test the eggs by placing them at the hole in front of the strong light. Call out as unfit for hatching those whose shells are chocked, checked, porous, speckled or chalky. Three hundred and sixty-egg machines admit of 380 or 400 eggs by resting the extra number (different ones every twelve hours) on the center rows of eggs. At least 40 eggs in winter and 20 at any time will be candled out at first testing.

Place incubator in a clean, fresh cellar, out of drafts and not in the sunlight. It should be, preferably, a damp cellar in which there is no furnace fire, and in which the temperature does not fall below 35 degrees, nor rise above 80 degree, at the time of incubation. There should be plenty of indirect ventilation in summer. Do not smoke in your incubating cellar. Test the two thermometers to be used by dipping and stirring them with a standardized thermometer in water at 105 degrees, and noting variations, if any, between 105 degrees and 100 degrees. (Do not use for comparison a self-registering clinical thermometer, since its mercury does not fall immediately. Theomometers will break if dipped into hot water suddenly, or if water becomes heated above their capacity). Stand the two tested thermometers on the eggs trays near the glass door of the machine.

Level the incubator. Open the lower ventilators one-quarter. Put a carbon wick in the burned and light it. Gradully during the next six hours increase the flame until the egg chamber is warmed, adjusting the regulator so that the thermometers do not vary a fraction of a degree from 100 degrees during the next six hours. Burn such a flame that there is plenty of play to the regular cap—a good-sized flame in winter, a moderate one in summer. Lay the eggs on the trays with the large air-cell slightly raised. Place the two thermometers one on each tray, one back, with the bulb of each one resting on the side of an egg. Be sure always that the bulbs touch the egg after the trays are pushed into the chamber. In a cold room, in winter, lay a heavy blanket over the glass door.

Your incubating has begun. Look at the thermometers morning, noon and night. Use the bull's eye tester for this purpose. Make a record of everything. Keep the temperature uniform at 102½ degrees until the 19th day. It will have a slight tendency to rise as incubation progresses and the eggs require heat. Examine the thermometers before you draw out the trays for airing. Every noon fill and clean the lamp, and trim the wick by turning it down to one 1-16th of an inch, and wiping it across it with a cloth. Trim it with scissors once a week. Try to get the same flame after trimming as before. Look at your thermometers in half an hour to see that you have done so.

Thirty-six hours after the eggs have been set, remove them, after closing the glass door, to a warm room. Allow them to air for five minutes, and so every 12 hours after this, morning and night, until the 19th day, gradually increasing the time from five minutes to half an hour at the end. Do not alloy them to become cold to the touch. While the trays are out, turn the eggs gently but thoroughly, rolling them with the palms of the hands. Change the four middle rows each time to the end of the trays. Always leave the large air-cell ends of the eggs slightly raised. Return the trays to the incubator, changing them side for side in the morning, end for end at night. The thermometer will rise to the right temperature in a few hours without adjustment of regulator. When the eggs are airing, make it impossible for yourself to forget them. At the end of the four day with white eggs, at the end of the fifth with brown, take one tray at a time and test the life of the eggs. Fertile eggs will be seen before the tester to have a spider-like formation, the body of which moves as the egg is moved. In other eggs this body is a black, stationary spot, or the red lines form a ring, or both. Such eggs contain dead germs, and are to be thrown away. A third class show clear except for the dark mass of the yolk slightly distinguishable. These are unfertile and may be used for home cooking. Doubtful eggs should be marked and kept separate on tray. Follow them from day to day until they are proved. If they contain no life the thermometer will register them lower, or they may be felt to lose their heat more quickly when the eggs are being aired. Ordinarily rest the bulbs of the thermometer on eggs with strong germs, so marked. Eggs that have become cracked are sometimes saved by the use of court plaster.

Mark the size of the air-cells on six thick-shelled eggs with a pencil on the shells. Test these eggs every other day, and see that the air-cells are gradually increasing toward one-fifth of the whole egg by the 17th day. If they are not, open the lower ventilators to one-half, but close to one-quarter again when the drying down of the egg becomes too marked.

Test all eggs again on the 11th and 17th days. On the 11th day some will be found with the small dead germ spot or with the red ring. Live eggs will be half darkened. On the 17th day cull out those that are spotted irregularly and watery. In the good ones the chick will almost fill the lower part of the egg and the air-cell will be more or less sharply defined. Doubtful ones in each case should be treated as at first testing.

After the testing on the 17th, the ventilators should be closed. Air and turn for the last time on the 18th day, leaving the large ends raised and the thermometers standing on the trays in front, not on the eggs, where they would be disturbed in the hatching.

In their new position they will register lower. Allow the temperature to rise a degree and a half in the last three days, the thermometers registering such a temperature that had they remained on the eggs they would have registered 104 degrees.

When the first peep is heard, which should occur on the 20th day, cover the eggs with cloths that have been thoroughly soaked in water at 120 degrees, and thoroughly wrung. Allow them to remain in the incubator twenty minutes. In this operation for the sake of quickness, do not remove the trays entirely from the machine. Place the trays in the incubator so that the chicks as they hatch will fall front and rear into the receiving chamber. Make the thermometers tight in their position. If the condensation does not cover at least half of the glass door, put a pie plate containing a little water at 110 degrees in the lower chamber, and leave it there until this mark of sufficient moisture is reached. Open the lower ventilators when there is too much moisture, or if chicks are gasping.

At 21st day and 12 hours take out the trays. Help such chicks only out of shells as are bound in by empty shells of other eggs. Return the empty trays and place half the chicks on them. Count unhatched eggs, deduct from number left after the last testing, and prepare brooder room accordingly. At the 22d day remove the chicks to brooders already heated to 100 degrees. Thoroughly clean the trays and diaphragm inside and out, scour the burned, and renew the carbon wick.

TURKEY AND GUINEA BROILERS.

The use of the turkey broilers in all of the club houses, restaurants, and high quality hotels in the large cities is greatly on the increase. For the purposes of information a number of chefs in the many popular resorts of the cities have been interviewed on the consumption of turkey poults, and the union of opinion seems to be that the people would gladly use them if they could only have them during a continued season of the year, but few of them ever reach the market. The use of turkey poults for broilers might be made profitable to those who do not hatch the turkey eggs that are laid late in the season simply because it is thoroughly understood that these late hatched poults can not be grown to roasting size in time for winter sales. Such late hatched poults never make good large sized turkeys.

But all of these eggs that are laid late in the season might be readily hatched and raised and as soon as the young poults reach the broiler size they may be disposed of for turkey broilers in the city markets. It seems scarcely probable that there is a possibility of overdoing this, and those who make the attempt to grow these late hatched poults to turkey broilers should make their plans for disposing of these some time ahead of the time they are fit for broilers. This can be done through correspondence with the commission or poultry dealers of the large cities. It is always better to communicate with these dealers and find out from them just when the demand will be the best for these turkey broilers, how they wish to have them dressed and what days in the week would be best for the product to reach the market.

All these little conditions should be though of and attended to in advance so that there will not be the possibility of killing and dressing the turkey broilers and sending them into market without knowing just when and where the demand will be. Quite often the market is glutted on certain days because every one seems to think that they should all ship on a certain day. If it is the hope of a locality to ship to market all their product on Monday, those who delay shipping until Tuesday night usually get the best of the bargain. This simply illustrates the fact that one should be careful and watch out so as not to ship into market the products until they are needed. Always trye to be in communication with some one as to the best time to ship, and by taking advantage of this it will be possible at all times to dispose of everything that you have to sell at a profit. Never get caught on an overloaded market and lose the whole shipment.

The demand for guinea hens of all sizes and ages is largely on the increase. The Guinea broiler at a pound each was very popular the past season at watering places and in the cities as well. The Quinea broiler at about a pound or a pound and a quarter can be made use of as a substitute for many kinds of game birds, and while it may be considerable time before they will be as extensively used as are the broiler chicken, the day is not far distant when every single Guinea broiler that can be grown will have ready sale in the city markets. The law prohibiting the cold storage of game birds, selling them out of season has made it necessary for the high class restaurants and hotels to have a substitute for game birds. There seems to be nothing that meets the demand so well as does the Guinea broiler, except the home grown or domestis pheasant.

Many are gathering together considerable numbers of Guinea hens, both the pearl and the white variety, and cultivating their growth. One man has fenced in quite a large piece of ground, part of which has underbrush, in which he has confined his Guinea fowls and has built high wire fences to keep the Guinea hens and other poultry from flying over them. In this park are several hundred white Guinea fowls, and the attempt will be made this season to see how many can be possibly grown in this way. In addition to this, as soon as the White Leghorn pullets have reached a size to be colonized out, several hundred of these will be turned into the same park to grow for laying pullets the coming winter. This attempt at growing the Guineas in the park and of raising the Leghorn pullets out in the open, with no shelter whatever but the trees and the underbrush, will be an attempt to learn whether the Guinea can be grown in this way; also if greater strength and vigor can not be gained by the pullets and so add to their ability at egg producing the coming winter.

In addition to the turkey and Guinea broilers special attention is being given to the growing of pheasants for market purposes. These pheasants may be grown as are poultry of all kinds, and very small hens or Cochin Bantams are made use of for hatching the young pheasants. Those who have the care of the pheasant growing prepare the nests in long rows upon the ground with a cover over each one. The small Cochin hens or Cochin Bantams as soon as they are broody are thoroughly dusted with Persian insect powder and places in one of these nests upon the tame eggs and the lid closed down upon them. When the attendant in charge is fully satisfied that they will make quiet sitters, they continue to dust their bodies in the plumage clear down to the skin with this Persian insect powder each day for seventeen or eighteen days prior to the hatching of the eggs. The use of the powder is kept up until three days before the eggs are due to hatch. Through this persistent care and attention in avoiding the possibility of the insect vermin being present on the bodies of the sitting hens or upon the young chicks when hatched it is possible to start the pheasants in perfect health and vigor and free from lice pest of any kind.

These young pheasants with the mother hens are grown much the same as are bantams. They are put in small coops which are at first provided with closed runways that prevent the possibility of the young pheasants wandering away from the mother hen. The mother hen in charge of the young pheasants is never permitted to go away from the coop. They are kept confined in the box coop, and as soon as the young pheasants are liable to fly over the small inclosure about the coop, this inclosure is removed and they are allowed to go and come at will to the mother hen.

The attendant in charge of the pheasants usually makes use of a low slight whistle quite like the call of the country butcher to attract the attention of the young pheasants. In this way they are called to be fed several times a day. The food most desirable for the young pheasants is a mixture of Spratt's Patent chick food, one-half hard boiled egg, and the balance some one of the best quality of chick foods that are made out of small broken grains. These foods are thoroughly mixed together and a little is fed from five to seven times a day to the young pheasants so as to keep them quiet and tame, to attract them to the coop of the mother hen, and keep them growing.

By keeping the mother hen thus confined she is apt to stay longer with the young pheasants and care for them, as there is not the same inclination for her to return to laying as there would be if she could wander over the hills and have a supply of natural or insect food. Thousands of pheasants are being grown in this way to stock game preserves, private estate, and to be sold into the markets. It is hardly probable that there is any law that will prevent anyone from selling these pheasant that are home grown into the market during any season of the year.—The Feather.

GUINEA FOWL.

The domestic Guinea fowl under ordinary circumstances can hardly be considered profitable poultry, but their character has nevertheless been considerably belied. Amongst other objections raised against it there are (1) its disposition to straying proclivities; (2) its disposition to lay out, by which many eggs are lost; and (3) its pugnacious habit of beating other varieties of poultry. We have it on the authority of Mr. Lewis Wright—who deals at some length with the breed in the June number of the new popular edition of his well-known "Illustrated Book of Poultry," now being brought out by Messrs. Cassell & Co.—than but for this latter habit the Guinea fowl would long since have been naturalized as a game bird, having been turned into covert with perfect success; but it was soon found out that the Guinea fowls drove away other descriptions of game to be destroyed on that account.

As a domestic bird, however, these bad qualities are (Mr. Wright tells us) susceptible of much amelioration, provided the treatment be kind and good. It is, he admits, almost hopeless to commence a stock with adult birds; directly they are left at liberty they are "off," and probably never return. But by seeing eggs under common hens, and rearing them at home, they grow up tame, and will flock around the person who feeds them, and even allow themselves to be taken up and petted like other poultry. When reared thus kindly, and secluded nests are provided, they will generally lay in the house, and if perches are placed high for them, and they are regularly fed every night, will roost at home also. So far domesticated they will pay to rear, in places where they have ample range. The hen lays from 60 to 100 eggs per annum, the eggs being rather small, very pointed at the end, and of a dark cream color. These eggs are of a beautiful flavor, and there is considerable demand for them in London, where we have often seen them exposed for sale in little baskets lined with green moss.

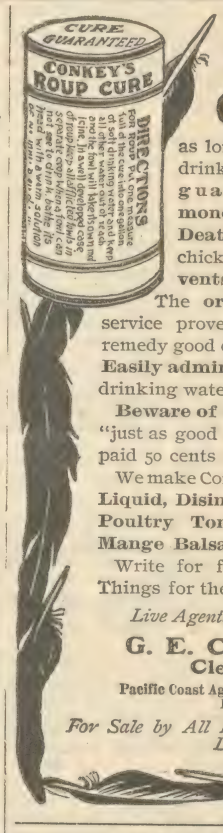
FREAKS OF THE SCORE CARD.

Perhaps no one had a better opportunity to see the vast difference between judges on score card judging than I had at the shows held at Chicago, December, 1903, and January, 1904.

Having had birds on exhibition at both shows, and both times the White Wyandotte class was judged by score card.



At the first show I had a hen cut 1½ points on color; the same hen was cut 4 points on color at the January show. The difference of the score was 2¼ points. Neither judge cut her on weight or condition. Another hen, color cuts 1½, shape cuts 3½; next show, color cuts 3, shape 4½. Had a hen at January show, 1904, in the very prime of condition. She was cut 5 points on color. Yet this same hen won 2d prize at Chicago, 1903, January, under comparison judging and in a class of sixty hens and by the same judge.

Saw a pullet at the last show get a high score and prize. She should have been cut 10 points on shape alone, and under comparison the judge would not have given her a pleasant "squint." But the little bit of pasteboard with the judge's name signed, passed her through O. K.

When judges can score specimens nearly alike, section for section, then and not until then can any faith be put in the score card. Why should one judge cut a difference of one point to a section, and that in snape? Had one bird scored the same by both judges, but different in each section. Of what value would a score card be when no two judges can score alike. The breeders and fanciers will not stand for this score card "humbug," and it is only a question of time until it is a thing of the past.

BARRED AND BUFF ROCKS.

I have won the past season at the following shows: Fitchburg, Mass., Stamford, Conn., South Framingham, Mass., Manchester, N. H., New Bedford, Mass. The above Barred Cockerels were all sired by 3d cockerel, 1903, Madison Square Garden, New York winner, 63 cockerels in this class. Reliable Poultry Journal February, 1903, liked this cockerel above all others in the show. I have a few cockerels sired by above cockerel for sale from $4.00 upwards. Standard weight. of very even color, barred well all over. If you want to improve your blood these cockerels are what you want. Money returned if birds don't suit you. I have had my pens mated up by one of the leading Poultry Judges in America—4 pens headed by high scoring cockerels. I have also one pen of Buff Rocks. For the cockerel in this pen and two pullets I gave Mr. Higgins, of Orange, Mass., $75. I have not many sittings to dispose of therefore have your orders booked early. My eggs will be from same pens as I breed from myself. Choicest Eggs $2.00 a sitting.

BANTAMS' EGGS IN JULY.—Just the time to hatch winners for the late fall and winter shows. A grand opportunity to get birds of the best strains in existence at the lowest prices. During the month of July I will sell mixed lots of eggs from all of my best pens of imported Bantams (with the exception of Black, Buff and Black Red Japanese; Buff and W. C. Black Polish and Golden Duckwing, and B. B. Red Game, which are positively all that I reserve from this offer). In this offer are included my incomparable pens of Birchen, Red Pyle, Silver Duckwing Games, Muffed, Blue, Red and Spangled Old English Games, Cornish Indian Games, Phoenix Game, Golden and Silver Sebrights, Black and White Rosecombs, Nankins, Light and Dark Brahmas, Black, Buff, White Partridge and Cuckoo Cochins, Barred Plymouth Rock Bantams, Scotch Gray (Dominique), Black Orpington and Langshan Bantams, Ancona Bantams, Black Tailed Gray and Golden Japanese, White Crested White Polish (with V combs and blue legs), Golden Polish and Buff Polish Bantams, White and Colored Silkies, Buff and White Frizzles and Rumpless Bantams. Eggs from all of these pens will be sold in lots at prices as follows: 100 eggs, $20; 60 eggs, $12; 30 eggs, $6; 15 eggs, $3. These lots of eggs will be packed all varieties mixed, just as they are gathered, each egg being marked with name of variety and date. No special selection will be made, and I assume no responsibility for infertility or loss in transportation. But I will have every care used in packing to insure safe delivery, and I am happy to say that at this date, June 15, my Bantam Eggs are remarkably fertile and are producing a high percentage of vigorous chicks. This is the greatest offer in bantams ever made in this country when the high quality of the birds is considered. Nearly every bird in these pens is a winner at the Crystal Palace or other great shows of England, and has been imported direct from Europe by myself. I received 800 from abroad during the months of January and February at a cost of from $5 to $50 each, and challenge any other yard in America to show their equal in high-class quality. I am rearing 2,000 of these birds myself, which will be offered for sale about September 15, at from $5 to $25 per pair. This offer is for the month of July only, as I shall break up my breeding pens about August 1st, to prepare the birds for the fall shows. Orders will be filled in regular rotation as they are received, therefore send them in early, as all orders not filled by August 1 will be returned. I recommend the 100 egg lot in preference to smaller ones, as in this large number the purchaser will probably get enough of each of the best varieties to insure getting a pair or trio. Remember that all of these are high-class, and that there are no scrubs or cheap birds in any of the pens. Faverolles eggs in July will be sold at $4 for 15, from the best pens of English Salmon and Erminie Faverolles. Pens 2 to 6 English Salmon and Ermine Faverolles, $2 for 15 eggs. Lakenvelder eggs, $6 for 15 eggs. Dr. A. H. Phelps, Glens Falls, N.Y. 64-66

GEYER'S SCURVY CURE FOR POULTRY was the first article introduced to the public for this purpose, which has been thoroughly tested in the last ten years by many of our brother fanciers who are willing to say with us that there is no other article on the market like this that can be relied on to do its work properly. It is something that the poultry fancier, who appreciates his fine birds, needs very much. What looks more disgraceful than a fine flock of chickens, many, or all of them, having their legs coated with a thick, hard, scabby crust which is called scurvy? It spoils the appearance of the birds and is very annoying to them. It is also contagious. Here we have a sure cure for this ugly disease. By following the directions we guarantee that it will take off that ugly, hard coat and leave the legs clean and smooth and give them their natural color. It also has no equal for healing sores and frosted combs and wattels. It makes them very bright and red. It is just what the exhibitor wants to prepare his birds for the exhibition room. Some of our customers tell us that they have tried it with good results for weak legs. We only ask you to give it a trial. It is put up in tin boxes. Money must accompany all orders. Price, 25 cents. Address, G. A. Geyer, Florin, Pa. 560tf

By Using Geyer's Champion Disinfectant & Vermin Destroyer

There are, in all classes of powders before the public, many calculated for the sure cure of lice and vermin and a dozen other purposes, yet are they reliable, and have they produced the results claimed?

In offering this compound, we offer a powder such as is not before the public, and fills a place that none other can for the purpose intended—a positive, sure disinfectant and destroyer of all vermin that invests either poultry, small animals, those of the barn yard.

It is a perfect destroyer of all disease germs, and produces a healthy odor wherever distributed. It is a sure cure for gapes, in young chicks.

If you are skeptical and don't believe in Powders or compound because of many worthless ones on the market, we ask, please cast aside your prejudice and give this compound a trial. It is put up in 2 pound boxes. Price 25c. 560tf

Facts and Fancies Concerning the World's Fair Poultry Show.

[By a Special Correspondent to The American Fancier.]

Wonder what has become of the Black Minorca breeders? Are they not going to offer a good line of specials for St. Louis? We hear it hinted that some of the usual leaders in working up specials and big entries for this club are keeping still and indifferent forsooth because they—the said leaders—do not have a lead-pipe cinch on the job of judging the Minorcas at St. Louis. The rank and file of this club should get a move on pretty quick or the big blacks will lose a lot of prestige. There are a whole lote of judges who know enough to judge Minorcas, and the St. Louis people are not likely to tie themselves up to any one man.

That's a big list of specials the Buff Plymouth Rock people offer at St. Louis: Cock, hen, cockerel, pullet and pen each seven cash specials—$15, $10, $5, $4, $3, $2 and $1 It all comes of that red-headed hustler—Denny.

The Barred Rocks have likewise done a good stunt in the line of specials; but where are the White Rocks? The breeders of the big whites are a wealthy class. Are they holding back so as to be the biggest and best? They are losing valuable time. If they want to bring out big entries from the lay members they should give the lay members something to lay themselves out for and that right away.

But when it comes to "putting up the stuff," the Wyandotte breeders are the fellows to betcherpileon. The old time Silvers were first in the field and have made a nice line of offers. The National White Wyandotte club, with that St. Louis man, Hallock, to stir up a whirlwind, have given 40 single and 13 pen and display prizes, the very lowest being $5. The Golden Wyandotte and the Buff Wyandottes clubs have both made respectable offers. Haven't seen anything from that Partridge crowd. What's the matter with them? Do they want to keep all their wealth for a home or New England show next winter?

The last Wyandotte club to be heard from is the American. Here is what they offer, and we think that young Napoleon Delano, down in Jersey, had some to do with corraling the boodle to make their offers; they are all right and to our mind more sensible than to string the prizes out down to the tenth degree: Cock $50, $10, $5; cockerel, $25, $10, $5; Hen, $10, $10, $5; pullet, $10, $10, $5; pen, $20, $10, $10; display, $25, $15, $10. A total of $235. It will make some hustling to get into the club, too, and don't forget it.

So far as we can remember, aside from the clubs we have named, the clubs that have promised specials are the Buff Leghorn, the Houdan, the Polish, the Andalusian, the Waterfowl, the Lakenfelders, the Bronze Turkeys, and the Rhode Island Red. Now, where are the Leghorns, White, Black and Brown, Single and Rose Comb?

SILVER PENCILLED WYANDOTTE, MALE

The Nomenclature Illustration in the New Standard of Perfection.

What about the Langshan people? The west is said to be full of them and a whole lot of fellows would like to judge them. Better give some time and attention to work up some Langshan specials.

And speaking of that special business reminds us that in our 25 years in the show room it is our recollection that nothing draws like the cash. Ribbons and rosettes, cups and bowls are all right in their place, but when it comes to drawing entries and making a big display, $50 in the real stuff is worth more than all other offers combined.

JULY MANAGEMENT OF TURKEYS.

To do their best, young turkeys require unlimited range and clean brooding quarters while they brood upon the ground, but after they take to roosting upon fences and trees, they will do well upon sufficient range, and very little other attention is needed.

I have known writers on turkeys to mention that the turkey hen leads the young in those rambling tours, and when confined for a time in coops is liable upon her release to lead the young beyond their strength.

Such is not the case however, as the young are the leaders, and the hen naturally follows to protect them. So long as the hen keeps following them, they keep moving on in search of the best food in the world for them, viz: bugs, flies, grasshoppers, etc.

I wish just here to impress upon the men on the farm the great service they can render the women folk (who are always the turkey raisers) by keeping an eye upon the turkeys while following their daily occupation. They (The men) are in the fields, so are the turkeys. The women are in the house, and have little opportunities to note what direction the birds are taking. I have often wondered at men saying, "I haven't seen the turkeys," while as a fact they may have passed not one hundred yards from where they were working. By simply noting which way they are going they could save women many a long tramp.

Turkeys find almost all their own food during July, August, and September. However, I give mine a full feed of shorts mixed with milk in the morning, and sound clean wheat at night. They have either skim-milk or buttermilk to drink at each meal. I believe sour milk is not harmful to young turks, and skim-milk one of the best things they can get.

It wll be necessary to bring the birds home each night if they do not show up of their own accord, but by all means allow them all the range you possiby can after five weeks old. I might add that the larger the flock, the larger will be the amount required for range.

SHOW FEMALES.

In order to get a glossy, brilliant plumage on hens, I have found nothing will answer the purpose so well as allowing them to hatch and rear a brood.

If broken off hatching they invariably lay a second lot, which delays the moult until late in the fall, and the feathers then are a dull color with none of the brightness that comes from an early summer moult, and besides they do not carry as much flesh at show time.—W. J. Bell in Poultry Advocate.

PROPER METHODS OF CONVERTING BROODY HENS INTO LAYING HENS.

At this season of the year there is always more or less difficulty experienced in breaking up the brooding hens. Of course, with the smaller breeds this difficulty is not encountered, but with the general purpose breeds such as Rocks, Wyandottes and Orpingtons this question is of vital importance. By the way, it should be considered a good quality in any breed of fowls the power to hatch their own young. No breed is suited to the farmer, or can be called a general purpose fowl that does not become broody. The non-setting breeds take, from time to time, periods of resting from three to six days, while most brooding hens if handled properly can be brought to laying in six or seven days.

The question to be considered is how this period of inaction can be shortened. It cannot be said that because a hen becomes broody, it is a sign that she needs a rest. It is often the healthiest and fattest hens that become broody. It is simply a case of the maternal instinct asserting itself, and should be treated as such. It used to be a common custom (and I have seen cases of it) to take brooding hens from the nest, duck them several times in the watertrough and throw them over the fence. Now any sensible hen will not be bluffed by any such treatment as that, and it is a foregone conclusion that most of them treated in this way will after a little go back to the nest again. This mode of treatment is based on ignorance, and I am glad to say that it is getting to be a thing of the past. Another old custom was to shut a hen under a box, and keep her there in the dark for three or four days without food or water. Certainly she will have plenty of time to reflect over her sins, but I fail to see how this is going to make her begin laying again in a reasonable time.

The question is how to break her up, and get her laying again in as short a time as possible. I shall outline a number of methods that will be found effective. The first is to have a small pen on purpose for brooding hens,there should be no nests and no straw on the floor. A cockerel should be kept in the pen, and they should be fed plenty of stimulating egg-forming food, such as mashes, oats, wheat and a feed of meat every day. Raw liver cut up into small pieces is a splendid thing to start them laying. Green food should be given every day while fresh water, oyster shells and grit should be before them constantly. With above treatment, I have had hens lay the fourth day after becoming broody. Every evening just before dark the hens should be put back into their respective pens. Some will make for the roost, while others will at once go back to the nest. These latter should be returned to the pen for another day's imprisonment.

Another plan much in vogue on large plants is to have in each pen a coop, slatted on sides and bottom especially for the setters. This is a time-saving device, as any hens found on the nests can be transferred to the coop at feeding time. These hens are fed liberally, and should be treated in much the same manner as in the first method.

Another method I try where I do not wish the female to get with other males is as follows: I take them from the pens and put them out on free grass range. After wandering about all day picking up bugs, and worms, they return at night quite unlike the cluckling hens they were in the morning. One or two day's treatment like this is usually enough.

A fourth method is to have the nests in the different pens arranged differently. In this way a great many hens can be broken up by merely being changed to another pen having a different arrangement of nests. Such a method will not do, however,where you wish an accurate account of the different matings.

In conclusion let me say, treat the brooding hen with kindness. It certainly is provoking sometimes to have a number of your hens go broody just when you were counting on every hen doing her duty. But remember, she cannot help it because it is simply nature asserting itself. Treat her kindly and sensibly, and she will repay you by soon forgetting her broodiness and again doing her duty in helping to fill the egg-basket.—John S. Martin in The Poultry Advocate.

CRUISER TOOK HIS EGGS.

"Because of the anxiety of a lighthouse keeper to market his eggs, the dignity of the Dominion Government of Canada has received a severe jar," said H. J. Kirkpatrick of Vancouver yesterday. "The offending keeper is the one who tends the light on Egg Island—a well-named isle—in the Gulf of Georgia.

"It is a lonely spot, wind swept and dreary, but behind his lighthouse the keeper has a little plot of ground where he raises chickens, with no fear of marauding neighbors. Recently the steamer Princess May passed there during a howling gale and reported a distress signal flying. Owing to the weather it was impossible to land to carry succor to the supposed distressed keeper.

The Dominion Government at Ottawa was notified by wire, and it promptly telegraphed back, ordering that the fisheries cruiser Kestrel be sent to investigate. She sped forth on her message of mercy at once. Arriving at the island she found a high surf running. For hours she battled with the waves, waiting for a favoring opportunity to send a small boat ashore. Finally her captain made a landing in his gig. He found the keeper alive, well and seemingly happy.

"'Why,' asked the captain, 'did you hoist your distress signal the other day?'

"'It was this way, captain,' replied the unabashed keeper. 'I had a lot of eggs here, and I couldn't get any boat to stop here to take the to Vancouver to market. Now you know what happens to eggs when they are kept too long. I just had to get them off, and the distress signal was the only way to get a steamer to stop.'

"The Kestrel took the eggs to Vancouver, but I am wondering what sort of a letter that keeper gets from the Department of Marine and Fisheries when the people at Ottawa learn the facts.—From the Seattle Post-Intelligencer.

I bespeak for the company in the future the same generous treatment you have accorded it in the past.

SHALL A BREEDER SELL POOR SPECIMENS AT ANY PRICE?

That is a breeder's question. Having purchased inferior stock well recommended, or not at all for that matter, at even a very low figure, the impression haunts one that that man's stock is inferior. I have purchased from breeders that probably have good stock in some varieties at least,and received inferior specimens. Though the price was low ,I can not quite bring my mind to the conclusion that I may order again at any price and get the truly good. At one time I purchased a pair of Pyle Bantams of a firm. They described them as good birds, but would sell for some reason or other for a low figure. They sent exceedingly inferior specimens. They may have good stock—I know they have in some varieties, for they have exhibited a good deal—but I will not give them one dollar for the best pair of Pyle Bantams they have on their recommendation.

A good bird or poor one prejudices ones' mind in favor of or against a seller to the extent that it takes considerable evidence to change the standard the known bird has fixed in the mind. This is doubly true of the unknown seller. Subject to approval is the form of sale, with restrictions, which gives satisfaction; but even these sales leave the impression the purchased bird establishes in the mind.

HARDY BREEDS.

Among the hardy breeds of poultry that thrive well during all seasons of the year may be mentioned the Brahmas, Cochins, Plymouth Rocks, Langshans and Wyandottes. Some breeds may excel them as layers in summer, but in the winter season they will prove as profitable as any, from the fact that they are very heavily feathered and have combs that are not excessively large, which enable them to endure the severely cold weather. The breeds named are of large size, and are also excellent market-fowls, having yellow skin and legs. The Leghorns are also classed among the hardy breeds, and give good results, though they are not of large size.—Farm-Fireside.

THE BROWN EGG FALLACY.

The recent "revelations" that have been made anent the artificial coloring of egg-shells will doubtless prove "the last straw" to dispel the fallacy, that the contents of brown-shelled eggs are of better flavor than those whose shells are white. It cannot be gainsaid that among fastidious customers brown-shelled eggs generally sell quicker and fetch better prices than white ones. But that it is a fad pure and simple must be acknowledged now that "the game has been given away." To a certain extent it may damage the trade in genuine brown-shelled eggs; nevertheless, many of those people who have shown a preference for brown shells over white will doubtless continue to do so.

Apart from the supposed better flavor of the brown egg, there is still the question of appearance! Some may ask what connection the appearance of the egg has with its sale, and the assertion that it has a lot to do with it in some instances, will possibly raise a smile among those who care nothing for the color of the shell provided that the egg is new-laid. But I was once informed by a lady customer who owned a large boarding establishment that not only were the brown shelled eggs selected by her boarders, but she preferred that kind, as the color looked better on the table, in that it made a pleasing contrast with the silver stands and the whiteness of the table linen! This is feminine, certainly; but it was well worth catering for, as I discovered.

I have dealt in eggs, in my private capacity, for many years. I am not what may be strictly termed an egg merchant, but I am a poultry-keeper in addition to the profession I follow. I have neither time nor inclination to go in for the business on sufficiently extensive lines to be classed as a poultry-farmer; in fact, I very much question if on a large scale I could realise the same percentage on invested capital as I do under present conditions, as I am so situated that I am in touch with a good private trade, that is supplied without any cost for carriage of eggs, loss from breakages, and so forth.

I keep fowls of both kinds, that is, sitters as well as non-sitters, for I have found that to secure an all-the-year-round trade in genuine new-laid eggs this is the only plan to follow, as one has to rely almost solely on the produce of the non-sitters, during summer at least. When I was "green" to the business, I used to sell the white-shelled eggs for what they would fetch, and as the prices realized for them were not as good as those obtained for the browns, I was somewhat discouraged. I tried going in solely for breeds that produced the required tint of shell, but, do what I could, I failed to get a regular supply from January to December.

This shortage lost me, for a time at least, two good customers; and as I thought that it might be the means of entirely spoiling the trade I had worked so hard to get, it made me consider ways and means. I therefore consulted with a friend, and after experimenting it resulted in my being able to oblige customers by providing them with brown-shelled eggs all through the year; and the tints are really most pleasing. The only part the hens have to do is to lay the eggs; mankind does the rest. But, there you are; brown-shelled eggs some customers will have, and rather than disappoint them, and at the same time lose a nice little trade, I take care to see that they get them. And I have done so for many years.

The artificial coloring of eggs is not a recent discovery. It has been known for a long time; scores of eggs so treated have been eaten by people who were and are too bigoted to find any goodness in white-shelled eggs; numbers have been exhibited at shows, and have gained prizes; they are commonly met with in shops at the present day. Those I sell are strictly new laid; this I always guarantee, and as I know for certain that the flavor is all that can be desired, and that the color of shell has nothing whatever to do with that part, I resort to artificial coloring when my hens will not save me the trouble!

It may not be strictly honest; that does not trouble my conscience, for where people have fads it generally pays to pander to them rather than to "choke off" a customer. And after all is said and done, the shells of the eggs are not eaten by human beings. If they were, it would be another matter. Looking for a moment in other directions, I might mention in support of my contention a few facts. It is known that some butters are artificially colored—with a harmless preparation, of course. Many cooks add a certain something to the water in which green vegetables are boiled, so that the color of them may be retained. Some kinds of beef are treated with coloring matter while they are undergoing the process of being pickled. And other comestibles (to say nothing of sweets) are treated in various ways, so that the color may please the eye. All these things are considered legitimate, hence it surely cannot be regarded as dishonest to color the shell of an egg.

It is folly, however, to judge the quality of an egg by the appearance of its shell. Let the color of the yolk be the chief guide. 9 fairly dark yolk generally indicates a rich egg, a pale one a poor egg. Iron is the principal thing to regulate the tinge of the yolk, hence if it be only present in a very small proportion it can be taken for granted that the egg is minus much of its nutrition. There are certain fallacies still existing in connection with eggs that might be touched on with advantage.

It is thought that the male bird has something to do with the quality of the egg—that is, that eggs laid by pullets and hens allowed to run with a cock or a cockerel are more nutritious than those produced by fowls that are permitted to exist without his association. But it is an error. The male bird has nothing whatever to do with the egg farther than to fertilize it; and even here he fails at times. And, beyond this, it is worthy of note that to keep a male bird in a pen from which the eggs are being gathered for edible purposes is a mistake in more ways than one. It means a greater cost for the production of the eggs, for he has to be fed. Often, too, a smaller number of eggs is laid; and fertile eggs are not as suitable as unfertiles for preservation purposes.

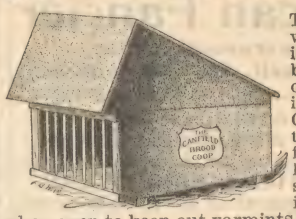
Some people contend that fowls not confined at all yield better and richer eggs than those entirely confined; or, as a recent writer put it, "there can be little doubt that the maximum of color is reached in the egg of the fowl living in healthy country surroundings. Eggs of the town-bred, 'cooped-up' fowl are found to be usually of an anaemic color." This, again, is a common error. I have kept fowls on large grass runs, with a practically unlimited range, and I have kept them in small back gardens, where they have not had more than, if as much as, ten square feet a head. Yet I can assert positively that I have had as full-flavored and as rich-colored eggs from the latter as from the others.

No, the color of the shell has nothing whatever to do with the quality or flavor of the contents of it. These two points are governed almost solely—in fact, I might say entirely—by the nature of the food given to the hens, and the way the birds are managed. When fowls are fed largely, or almost exclusively, on raw meat or blood, as often happens when there is a slaughter-house in the immediate vicinity, the yolk of the egg, besides being of a very dark, color, is also strong, and often coarse-flavored. And the same may be said of the yolks of eggs produced by fowls that are kept in a state of nature, allowed to run almost wild in woods and among rank vegetation. On the other hand, when milk is largely employed in the diet the yolk is pale, and the white often has a milky appearance; the whole egg is watery and less firm in texture than that laid by a hen fed on grain; it is insipid and unsatisfactory when used in pastry, or when poached.

If fowls that are kept in confinement are given a good variety of food, abundance of fresh green vegetables, insect food or meat in some form, grit, and pure water; are made to exercise by having the grain allowance thrown on or buried in some loose material; are kept where they can have the advantage of sunlight and fresh air; and the minor details of poultry-keeping are attended to, the hens will lay as good quality, nourishing, and full-flavored eggs as they would if they were allowed to roam at will. Should the yolks of any hens appear pale, the administration of an iron tonic in some form or other will generally put matters right. —N. H. in Poultry, England.

SKIM MILK IN CHICKEN RATION.

A product which is plentiful on many farms is skim milk, and its value as a food for young calves and pigs is well known. That it may be used to advantage in feeding young chickens has been demonstrated by experiment. Its ntritive ration is quite high since the separation of the cream from the milk leaves behind the greater part of the nitrogenous substances, thus giving to the skim milk considerable nutritive value. The Indiana station a few years ago made some interesting trials for the purpose of determining the value of skim milk in making up a ration for young chickens. Two lots of ten chicks each, from four to six weeks of age and as nearly uniform as possible, were selected. Beginning on July 11 the feeding tests were continued to September 5, during which time the two lots were fed under identical conditions, except that one lot received, in addition to the food given the other, all the skim milk they could drink. Both lots were given all they could eat of a mixed food consisting of two parts crushed corn, one part bran, and one part ground oats. They were fed three times a day, except on Sundays, when an increased amount of food was given at the morning and evening meal. Both lots were also given all they could consume of cracked bone, cabbage, lettuce, and water, of which no record was kept.



It was found that the lot receiving skim milk ate more of the mixed food and made a more rapid and satisfactory gain than the lot which did not receive skim milk. Milk fed chickens made an average weekly gain of 4.6 ounces, those receiving no milk 2.62 ounces. The most rapid increase in weight occurred at those periods when the largest amounts of skim milk were consumed. The skim milk is considered especially valuable as a food for young chickens during the hot dry weather and becomes of less importance as they grow older and the weather becomes cooler.

The vessels in which the milk is fed should be scalded frequently to keep them clean and wholesome.—Michigan Farmer.

A NEW MITE KILLER.

Lice and mites—one must fight them always. Get rid of the little ones, says an old time poultry woman and the big ones take the premises, her idea being that the mites drive off the big lice. We who know anything about it, know that mites can be got rid of easy, while the big lice come from—you never know where, because you can not find their breeding grounds. If you have a tight chicken house—this is claimed by those who have used it—to be an effectual louse killer of all kinds lurking in the house. Take a sponge and thoroughly soak it with carbon bisulphate. Hang it up in the house, close the doors and windows and let it hang there several hours. Its fumes will kill every louse, nit or mite within reach of its fumes, which are strong enough to penetrate into all crevices. As it is an explosive, in using it one must be careful not to bring it near a spark of fire.—Farmers' Sentinel.

SATURDAY, JULY 2, 1904.

The illustration on our title-page is a fac-simile of one that will be found in the new illustrated Standard. It takes the place of the horrible apparition that has done duty as a nomenclature illustration for many years, and, incidentally, has graced (?) Mr. Lewis Wright's famous poultry book. The new illustration represents the Silver Pencilled Wyandotte and was selected because all the different color and shape sections are blended best in this variety for the purpose of illustrating them.

Bantamizing the larger breeds takes time and patience by the bucketful. There is no quick road if good results are desired, unless it happens to be by the Game-Bantam mother route. Give an active mother (?) of this variety one lone chick to take care of, and if said chick, after undergoing all the acrobatic stunts, half-mile walks, hundred yard dashes and loop-the-loop exercises of its mother, survives, it will be a bantam and no mistake. It will have precious little time to grow, but what's left of it will be as tough as a boarding house steak.

No new breeds were manufactured last week, consequently no boom is liable to startle poultrydom during the torrid season.

The Fanciers' Poultry Association of New Jersey is a body of men that any state may well be proud of. Fanciers to the core, they faced a big deficit at the last show, one so large that would have sent the average society to the tall timbers. But they rate quite considerable above the average, and at the annual meeting recently held, the directors were instructed to wipe out all indebtedness, which was done, and checks were mailed to all who had claims against this thoroughbred organization. The response of the members in taking increased holdings of stock ,with the accompanied cash, was as excellent as it was prompt. It bears out what we have always contended, viz.: It is real fanciers that make the shows.

It would, at this writing, be rather premature to anticipate the plans of the "Jersey Thoroughbreds" regarding the next Newark show, but we are reliably informed that the dates will be set shortly and some very decided innovations promised in the modus operandi of managing a really up-to-date function, and Jersey seems inclined to set the pace in up-to-date show business, to judge by Supt. Gladney's letter regarding the big Trenton fall show, which appears in this issue of The American Fancier:

To Numerous Inquirers: The New Illustrated Standard will not be used in judging at the early shows next fall and winter. It is expected to be ready for delivery the end of October or early in November. At the St. Louis meeting of the American Poultry Association definite action will be taken regarding the time when the new Standard should be the law that governs poultry exhibitions.

Hot brooder floors have and are killing thousands of chickens. We have had numerous complaints this season of chickens dying off in "blocks of five" or more. Feed was all right and the name of brooders used should have been all right, but it was not so. Failure to observe nature's laws, carelessness in not sending out correct instructions to beginners has caused a heap of trouble, a big loss and an avalanche of disgust.

Chickens are not hot house products. They must have exercise in the good, old-fashioned air that is of vital importance to all healthy beings. Stuffy brooder houses with hot floors are just what chickens do not want and just what they cannot survive. We have seen too much of this coddling business in the past, and the thousands of chickens killed is amply proven by the thousands of dollars lost in building expensive plants that not only were unsuitable for the chicken business, but if used as dormitories for even the most case-hardened hobo or tramp, would have killed the latter.

All young chickens need warmth. That every observing youltryman is aware of. If he watches the chickens with the mother hen, he will find just where and when that warmth is distributed. Not from the toes up; but from the head down. If a healthy man thinks he can sleep comfortably with a couple of hot water bags on his feet, let him try it. The chances are his pedal extremities will be found minus covering, enjoying the normal temperature outside.

One of the best brooders ever manufactured and one that was a success fifteen years ago, is a success to-day. It never had anything but top-heat, and had a movable floor that could be lowered as the chicks grew larger. There was no danger of ''chickens'' losing the use of their legs, the common ailment caused by over-heated floors. Besides, the chickens had a chance to get all the fresh air they wanted by peeking out from the fringe cloth when the top heat was a trifle too warm.

The St. Louis Siftings, which will appear occasionally during the summer months, in the American Fancier, are written by a veteran poultryman, one who is in close touch with what is going on in poultry matters, and who, being a traveller over a goodly portion of the West and East, gathers and gleans much of interest to intending exhibitors at the World's Fair.

The policy of the American Fancier is to give the news regarding the St. Louis function without fear or favor. The same will rule regarding all other shows. This is a newspaper and not the personal organ of any one man or clique.

F. S. Nicholson will again be in charge of the poultry at the Great Cambridge Fair, August 30 to September 2. Mr. Nicholson removed from Cambridge to Otisville, N. Y., for the benefit of his health, and we are glad to state that the high altitude and bracing air of that nicely located spot in Orange county, has worked wonders and our old friend of Barred Rock fame is enjoying splendid health and says his chickens are doing the same thing. The abilities of Supt. Nicholson are so well known and highly appreciated that the up-to-date management of the Cambridge Fair insisted on his coming all the way from Otisville to look after the poultry exhibits.

After July 1, Charles McClave becomes an ex-president of the American Poultry Association, and D. Lincoln Orr becomes its president. Owing to circumstances over which Mr. McClave had no control, he was unable to preside at the annual meeting held in Rochester, but he retires with the distinction of having presided at the now famous Indianapolis meeting of September, 1903. That was glory enough, for he stood the ordeal without winking an eyelash. But Charles McClave was, is and will be, a peaceful citizen and a conscientious official of any office entrusted to him.

The advent of D. Lincoln Orr to the presidency means a vigorous administration from the start. It will mean business with a big B. If hustling devotion to principle and absolute fearlessness will make the American Poultry Association a success, the new leader is just the man to embody them. The old society needs a firm hand at the wheel and with the other experienced old craftsman, "Tom" Orr, as a running mate, the "two Orrs" are destined to make lots of new history for the American Poultry Association.

Mr. William Cook, of the firm of Wm. Cook & Son, has returned to England to look after his large Orpington interests, while the son is looking after the interests of a hotel located between Newark and the Oranges, and incidentally keeping an eye on the American bred Orpingtons raised near by.

The development of the Orpington in America by the famous Cook route has increased the interest in the breed greatly, and incidentally caused much speculation as to the best, or, rather, most proper methods of keeping this fowl before the public. There are a number of first class fanciers of this valuable fowl that are sawing a very fine pile of hard wood just now. The shows of next fall and winter will develop some very interesting doings in the Orpington alley.

The following letter, dated June 10, was received at this office:

Editor American Fancier:

You may announce in your issue for July that I have sold my interest in the Prairie State Incubator Co. and that I retired from the management of same July first.

I wish to express my appreciation of the courteous treatment I have received from the poultry press and to thank one and all for the favors granted me in the many years I have been so closely identified with them as an advertiser.

The Prairie State Incubator Co. will continue to do business at the old stand and under the old name.

Yours very truly,
A. F. COOPER.

Mr. Cooper's valedictory addressed to the poultrymen of the world appears in another column of this issue and should be carefully read by all.

Personally, we feel very sorry to print these announcements. We have known Mr. Cooper a great many years and knew him well when he first struggled with Dame Fortune to place a mighty good incubator on the market. He had the goods, the push and the partners, but in those days incubators and brooders were not what they are to-day, viz.: necessities. People years ago had an idea that the old hen was good enough for hatching and rearing chickens. To overcome that was the work of such men as A. F. Cooper, J. L. Nix and others. They succeeded, and to them much of the credit is due for popularizing artificial incubation and rearing in the United States and abroad.

In the long years the Prairie State Incubator Company has been before the public, not a murmur of complaint has ever reached us regarding their business methods, their statements and their promises. It is an eloquent testimonial to true business principles, and while Mr. Cooper retires with the well-earned riches of an honorable business career, the greatest inheritance he can emjoy in future years is: The respect of his fellow-men, patrons and the poultry press. He handled and treated all as he would like to have been treated. The old firm is in good hands, however, and will adhere to the high standard that governed it in the past, in all its dealings in the future.

We are pleased to learn that Mr. T. F. Rigg of Iowa Falls, Iowa, is on the rapid road to recovery, after a most serious illness which involved a surgical operation attended with considerable danger. Mr. Rigg is one of the best writers on poultry matters in the United States, and as associate editor of the American Poultry Journal has done fine work. As a breeder and judge, especially of Houdons, he is known from ocean to ocean as a thorough and most conscientious gentleman.

Harry A. Waldron and C. E. Twombley have joined forces and started the Eastern Poultry and Pigeon Supply Co., at Boston, Mass. This should make a great team and we are very glad to have Mr. Waldron back in the fancy after his almost fatal accident last year, that came near costing him his life. We extend to the new firm our sincere wishes for their future success.

TABASCO SAUCE.

Wonder why Steinmesch did not send Priercy his latest circular about that cooping business?

Piercy his latest circular about that Frankey Heck's paper.

Wonder why?

If any one thinks Drev. writes these squibs they are off their trolley.

No one but a lobster would write such stuff and there are just two in the business—me and Robby.

Tommy has called for a vote for the next annual meeting place. Rather ahead of time, eh?

Doesn't give every show a chance to invite the wonderful assemblage of wind bags.

Wonder if our friends across the border will vote this trip?

No. 1. The Hon. Dave Nichols| Davey is going to have a $2 standard. Good boy, Dave.

For $1.50 I will send you a new standard, the American Fancier and a sure, absolutely sure method for breaking up a broody hen.

Sparks must have sent that carload of soap around to the editors, as things look as if they were cleaning house.

It will take another carload, old man, for Boston. Send it by fast freight.

I called on your friend from Hoboken the other day. He was standing in the chicken house door with broom in hand.

Well, old fellow, what are you doing? "Vell I joost make the house mit de room oudt sweepen." (Laughter.)

Years and years ago in the time of dear little Theo. Sternberg, (Theo. how I miss you) all was serene. Men of brains were in control.

Well, the good old times have passed and the men of brains have gone or taken a back seat.

Have we their equal to-day? Nit.

New York or Minnie, which?

The recent burning of the General Slocum puts me in mind of many brooders, i. e., over-crowded and poorly managed.

The Dutch have taken New Amsterdam (revised quotation).

Dear Me! Bro. Lamon is going to quit. Guess I'll quit too.

WEST POINT.

June 14-18.

The first mid-summer show of the Western New York Fanciers' Association was held at Celeron, two miles from Jamestown, N. Y., on Lake Chautauqua, June 14 to 18. This is going to be a fixture at this season. The auditorium is the finest hall in the state for show purposes, being 225 feet long and 165 feet wide, with an annex 800 feet long in the rear, lighted on all sides and from the top. Because of the splendid light, the U. S. Photographers' Association has used this hall for their annual meeting and art exhibition for five years. The visitors number to Celeron from two to twenty thousand daily, and the outlook is good for a profitable show for the exhibitors. The awards are:

THE GREAT TRENTON SHOW.

This, the fanciers' great fall show, will be held as usual at the Inter-State Fair, Trenton, N. J., Sept. 26 to 30. While the association could not give this department a new building, as was hoped and partly promised, owing to very heavy expenditures along other lines, yet there will be lots of things that will make this show greater than ever.

This year the entries will positively be limited to 1,000 and as soon as this number is reached the entries will be closed. This will insure a show that is free from crowding, and at the same time make a win of more value to the exhibitor. The list of judges engaged so far includes, J. H. Drevenstedt, T. F. McGrew, J. D. Nevius(M. F. Delano, W. J. Stanton, H. Ungerer, F. H. Castner, Fred Huyler, Wellington Kennedy and G. W. Spohn. The specials will be better than ever, covering cash, silver cups and ribbons. The Buff Leghorn club offers to members a handsome club ribbon on each the best cock, hen, cockerel and pullet.

The New Jersey White Rock club offers a handsome ribbon each 1st and 2nd cock, 1st and 2nd hen, 1st and 2nd cockerel and 1st and 2nd pullet.

The Lakenfelder Club offers to its members $20 in cash, a $15 silver cup and 6 ribbons. The association will give this breed a full classification.

The International Water Fowl club offers a handsome ribbon on each best male and female in all standard duck and goose classes. Also offers $5 in cash to winner of most ribbons. The $25 Ivory Soap silver cup is offered under the usual conditions.

It is also expected that one or two other specialty clubs will offer their specials with us this year.

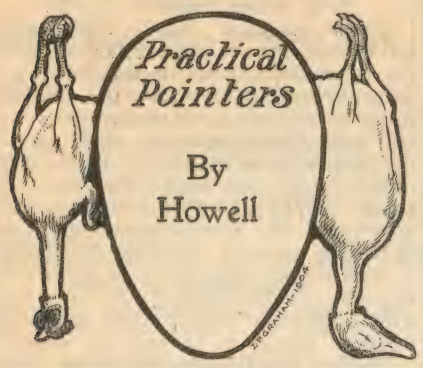
Entries will close Sept. 14. The premium list is now being compiled and anyone desiring space in it should write at once for terms. So remember the fall show of the year.

W. S. GLADNEY, Jr., Sec'y.

THE MINK-PROOF COOP.

These vagrant little depredators have caused us much loss in the poultry yards and no end of annoyance and work in trying to protect our growing fowls from their nocturnal attacks. At one time they attacked full grown chickens during the day time. We have found as high as thirty half grown chicks, ducks and turkeys dragged under the sills of buildings, some of which showed scarcely mutilation. This wholesale slaughter is something beyond our understanding, as they would continue to kill fresh ones each night.

We had tried various kinds of tight coops and finally built a henhouse, with a turkey shed attached. The turkey apartment is inclosed with wire netting and partitioned from the main building with the same netting. The outside netting is used in winter months as a protection to the glass sashes that provide light and sunshine. The house is a model one, but not mink proof. Sometimes an over energetic mother hen would scratch too near the "underpinning," which is where the weak point in the building lies. One small stone being loosened with but little effort on his minkship's part would allow his wedge shaped head to enter when it was no trouble for his body to follow, as well as his "following," for they go in pairs, usually in two pairs. At one time we traced them to their temporary hiding place under some rocks, only a few rods from the henhouse, and succeeded in killing four. Again, they took refuge in the barn floor under some lumber, and were located after destroying half of our summer chicks. This time we also killed four. Each year we have lost more or less, till we have become almost discouraged. Our farm buildings are located, we are informed by old trappers, on a "mink train." This they explain to be a direction they take to go from one creek to another. In this instance they follow a spring run through our farm, then pass over a ridge, where their path meets another such spring run that leads to another large stream. Along these trails they have different abodes, and shift from time to time. One trapper reports tracking one in the snow for four miles, then giving up the trail, though mink fur was at its best price. He said they are great travelers, but usually keep to certain trains, though at great distances. This is why one farm will seem to be infested, while neighboring farms will not be molested by them.



We had a few early hatched chicks this spring, and, from past experience, put them into close coops. The second morning we found our coops had been tampered with. The third, two of the chicks were missing. We then improvised a swinging coop from a store box fourteen inches deep, fifteen inches wide and twenty-seven inches long. This we laid on its side, fitted a slat door to the front, and and swung it to a beam; since then we have lost no chicks. This coops accommodates one Leghorn hen and twenty chicks. A good stout frame, covered with chicken wire netting, with a tight board floor, would be a great improvement over our hastily constructed coop; yet, they prove quite satisfactory. Any one having had experience with minks can know when they have been around, as they leave a disagreeable odor, especially if interrupted either by man or dogs. There is but little danger from them in daylight until the crop fields are grown enough for them to hide in and sneak upon their prey. Although they are seldom seen, they are not wild. They will glide among the grasses or weeds or crowl under some fence or log and wait and watch as one passes along. They are wary and cautious, choosing well their locations and moving on at the first signs of danger. We think, however, that the swinging coops will solve the mink problem, at least until the summer advances so they can steal upon the fowls through the grass. Our experience is that they don't go far from the streams.—C. F. W., in Prairie Farmer.

Mr. Howell, associate editor of The American Fancier, will furnish weekly reports on the egg and poultry market, and answer all questions submitted to him relating to commercial and practical poultry keeping. When replies are requested to be sent by letter, stamps must be enclosed and letters addressed to George E. Howell, 70 Christopher St., New York City.

Eggs.—Week's receipts less than 85,000 cases. Many shipments have become affected by the hot weather and fancy offerings becoming smaller and smaller; to add to the difficulty, the weekly consumption does not reach so high an aggregate as the receipts.

A writer on poultry matters says: "The way to get pullets to laying in the fall is to sell off the cockerels for broilers and push along the pullets for the first four and one-half months, by which time they should be laying. Vermin is fought vigorously in and out of season, early and late." Well, the only thing to be said about such advice is, if they won't lay under such treatment, they won't lay at all.

I do not like to be discourteous to any reader of the American Fancier, but I also want it to be distinctly understood that this column isn't being run as an egg annex to the Spruce Farm Dairy. I am always pleased to hear from any reader on eggs or any other subject relating to the poultry business, and if the discussion should be of interest to our readers I am doubly pleased to give it out in this column.

We try to make our market report as reliable and fair to both shipper and receiver as it is in our power to do; not only our personal dealings, but all in the business whom we come in contact with are consulted, and for this reason I respectfully refer all enquiries on the subject to said report. When personal and direct information is wanted, a stamp must be enclosed or no reply will be forthcoming.

An American Fancier reader who keeps White Leghorns for profit likes my idea of the producer being his own retailer so well he sends me a copy of the adv. he carries in the local papers published in the city where he finds his market.

And the best part of the story is, his trade is increasing. It could not be otherwise when the quality of the stuff he puts out is taken into consideration. Having handled a good many of his eggs, I can vouch for the quality.

Perhaps a satisfied customer is one's best advertisement, still printer's ink opens up new channels and it shows our poultrymen are keeping abreast of the times.

Seek a home market and get the cash when the goods are delivered. you will then, instead of the middleman, be able to do business on your own money.

A Richland, Pa., egg shipper writes his receiver at this end that "he had a brood of chicks hatched the 15th of last December, and the pullets commenced laying May 10. This is so uncommon that I have made a note of it. They were hatched from eggs laid by White Wyandotte hens mated to a White Leghorn male. None of us have forgotten the severity of last winter's weather, and that these chicks were able to survive would have been remarkable, but to have have matured and commenced laying in less than five months' time is a record breaker and speaks volumes for the care and quarters his poultry enjoy.

It is claimed by experts in the duck raising industry that each duck is expected to furnish the raw material for twenty pairs of young ducks during the season, usually from nine to ten months in duration. These figures are based on a supposition that during the most favorable portion of the year a duckling is hatched from every two eggs; at other times the ratio runs as low as one from ten. From this number hatched another one in every ten is expected to lose its quack from a natural cause or an accident.

The expense attached to a duck farm is enormous, and when successful the profits are correspondingly high.

There are many ideal places for duck rearing scattered about the country, hillsides, leading down to a stream of running spring water with the accompanying marshland, utterly valueless for any agricultural purpose make ideal locations. If the water does not freeze over except in the most severe weather, the battle is half won. Breeding ducks at their best need a swim every day in the year.

ROCHESTER RUMBLINGS.

The many friends of John Bantam Drechsler, late secretary of the Flower City Poultry & Pigeon Association, will be pleased to learn that he has been promoted to editor-in-chief of the Vredenburgh base-ball team and hereafter all letters should be addressed in care Seneca Park. Congratulations, John.

John Tallinger, Jr., has been busy for the last two weeks planting peach roots and is therefore excusable for delay in answering inquiries for Speckled Wyandottes.

Henry Schwab, notwithstanding his harsh-sounding name, is constantly occupied in coaxing chicks from his Barred Rock eggs. He has lately perfected a system or rather a register which indicates the chances of each chick winning at Philadelphia.

John Benefactor Mitchell, like his namesake, does not believe in working for a living and is, therefore, closing out his Dorking emporium. In the future he intends crossing Buff Cochin Bantams with bumble-bees, thereby increasing the production of honey.

George Shelter is still true to name and harbors everything from Cochin Bantams to Guernsey horses. His latest contribution to the Scientific World on "How to Run an Incubator Without a Thermometer" has placed him in the front ranks of our great scientists.

George Oliver has materially increased his egg yield this spring by feeding wire shingle nails in liberal quantities. To some this seems an expensive feed, but as George is in the

LATE HATCHING.

June and July and even August chicks will be more plentiful this year than for many seasons past. It is quite possible if care and attention is given to the proper feeding of late chicks to grow them into good sized specimens before the winter sets in. There are accounts of Leghorns and Brahmas that have laid their first eggs from five to five and a half months of age. Chicks hatched the first of June will be five and a half months old by the fifteenth of November. If they have been forced and fed for quick growth from start to finish, even these June hatched chicks, if the Mediterranean or American varieties, may be so fed that they will gain their full growth and be equal in size and quality at the same age as would the same varieties that may have been hatched in April and cared for under the ordinary ways and methods of the poultry yard.

It is not only necessary to pay special attention to the keeping, feeding, providing of shade and care for the late hatched chicks to send them along and have them do quite well, provided they are not over-crowded or over-run by chickens that have been hatched earlier in the season. The way to be successful with late hatched chicks is to keep them by themselves. Start them on a separate part of the poultry yards or farm. Do not keep them among the chickens that are several weeks or perhaps months older than they. These older ones will take from them all the good wholesome morsels of food that would follow the plan of keeping them. If every one who hatched late chicks would follow the plan of keeping them in colonies where they will be fed, watered, ranged and grown by themselves, they would be surprised to know how much better the chicks would do and how much faster they would grow, even than the chicks that were hatched a month or two earlier.

From June until late fall the supply of bugs, worms, and insects of all kinds are more plentiful than during any other season of the year. This is of great advantage to the young chicks providing they are kept off by themselves where they have full sway in securing insect life, which adds so much to their growth and health. But if they are kept among and grown with chicks that are older and can out run them, run over them, trample them down in the race for obtaining the bugs and worms, they will never grow to be the equal of the larger ones.

Care and judgment in the handling of these late hatched chicks will make them equal those that are hatched prior to the 15th of June. Those hatched later than this in the season should be cared for and fed equally well, and as soon as they have grown to a profitable size for broilers, frying chickens, or market poultry or any kind, it is better to sell them to market rather than to feed them into the early spring before they will begin to produce eggs. More than half of the trouble in the growing of chicks that are hatched late in the season is that they are not given half a chance in their struggle for life and existence among those that are from six weeks to two months older than they. A moment's consideration of these conditions will readily prove the truth of these statements. Every time a promiscuous lot of young chicks are fed together the larger and older ones trample down the smaller and younger ones. The result is that the older ones obtain the greater part of the best food that is thrown to the late, and the late hatched, smaller ones get what they can, and seldom prosper.

Everyone who reads this will quickly say: "Why did I never think of this before?" That is the great trouble in the poultry business. Success is often driven away and made impossible through the neglect of those in charge, simply because they do not stop to think and consider the most reasonable and natural things in poultry existence.

When visiting a poultry plant during the past season, every place we went the old hen and the young chicks trotted around after us more like a lot of pet dogs than poultry. We had been invited to the plant to advise with the owner as to why his poultry was not doing well. It was quite evident that the poultry was only receiving about one-half to eat. After thorough examination this statement was made to the owner, who in thorough surprise stated, "we have been giving them just what they would eat up clean in five minutes twice a day."

This poultryman was advised to make self-feeding hoppers of a very cheap character and place them under the shelter of the old shed and keep them constantly filled with dry bran. Also to make a catch board under each so that the bran that might be wasted could be readily dumped back into the feed hopper again. In addition to this he was told to feed the young stock in long troughs where there would be no crowding, and a well prepared mash food that they would eat twice a day, and also the feeding of all the cracked corn, whole wheat and hulled oats that the poultry would pick up morning and evening. This provided for four full feeds a day for the growing stock, and placed at their disposal feed hoppers filled with dry bran.

It took considerable argument to induce the adoption of this method of feeding because the owner had become so thoroughly infused with the notion that the worst thing in the world that could be done was to overfeed the poultry. The statement was then made that it was utterly impossible to overfeed young growing stock. That the condition or rather the lack of thrift that had possessed his flock would make it utterly impossible to overfeed any of them, if properly fed on good wholesome food in the next six months. The adoption of the plan as advised was followed. A month or six weeks later on visiting this same place all the young stock was wandering over the fields from which the hay had been cut in search of bugs and worms. The man said:

"It is now almost impossible to call them in at noon time to be fed. I never saw such a change in poultry in my life. For the first week or ten days they stayed around to be fed. Soon their desire for feed seemed to be supplied and they began wandering and searching over the fields. They are thoroughly fed in the morning when turned from the pens with all the mash food they will eat, grain is offered or given to those at noon that come up for it, and the boxes of cracked corn, whole wheat and oats is ready for them about the roosting pens when they return at night. They are allowed to eat all of this they will before going to roost. That which is left is gathered up and returned to the feed bins to be used again the following evening, and the mash food is prepared the first thing in the morning, the troughs are reasonably filled with this, the calculation being made as to about how much they will consume during the morning meal."

The secret of success in the growing of poultry of all kinds whether for market or for other purposes is in feeding plentifully, wisely and properly the very best kinds of food to hasten growth without injuring the growing chicks. Too much corn may be fed, but if the proper balanced ration is given them made of wheat, oats and corn they will not get more than is good for them to eat. In addition to this it is only necessary that they shall have plenty of grit, greens and water, and all the range that can possibly be provided for them to run over while growing. The adoption and following of these methods will insure the speedy growth of the late hatched chicks. It is only a question of colonizing them away from old chicks and where they will be well and properly fed, to hasten their growth into strong, full sized, well feathered poultry.—The Feather.

This is to certify that I have sold to Ralph Lyons, the Buff Leghorn specialist of East Kingston, N. Y., my entire stock of best birds in S. C. Buff Leghorns, including all my N. Y. and Boston Winners. They are the best in the land.

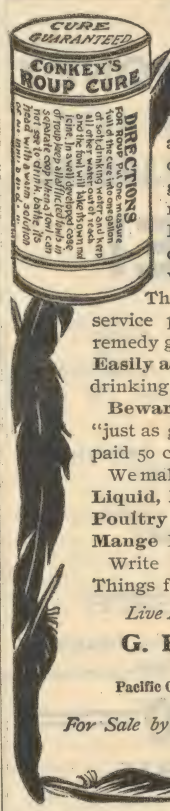
FATTENING DUCKS, GEESE AND TURKEYS.

The rearing and fattening of ducklings for the market form a profitable business, which is an important industry in many districts, especially in the neighborhood of Leighton Buzzard, on the borders of the counties of Bedford and Buckingham, and in the direction of Aylesbury. In former years the business was localized more in the Aylesbury district, but latterly it has extended, and now in various parts of England there are duck-fattening establishments.

In the districts mentioned the breeding of the ducks is undertaken by people who are quite distinct from those engaged in the work of rearing and fattening the young birds. Contracts are generally made with farmers, cottagers, and others who may keep ducks and drakes for the delivery to one purchaser of all eggs laid, at prices agreed upon. These prices are generally about 3s. 6d. per dozen, and sometimes three or four times that sum. By this system those who keep breeding ducks find a regular market for eggs.



Hatching operations commence in October, the eggs being put under hens and the ducklings reared as has been previously mentioned. For the first week after hatching the ducklings remain with the hen. They are never allowed to roam at large, nor do they go on the water, the object being to reduce the wear and tear of muscular tissue to a minimum, so that as much as possible of the food may be utilized in adding to the weight of flesh on the bird.

The ducklings are usually kept in long, low, semi-dark sheds, to which suitable runs or yards are attached; and they are generally only allowed into the yards three times a day (7 a. m., noon, and 5 p. m.), when they are fed. It is common to keep the younger birds in flocks of fifty, or even a hundred; but where birds of different ages are being fattened at the same time it is most beneficial to keep them in flocks of two dozen or so, dividing them by using 1ft wide boards placed on edge.

When the ducklings reach the age of five weeks they are fed on a fattening diet, an important constituent of which is greaves or tallow scrap (scrap cake) the refuse from tallow chandlers' factories. The meals consist of good quality rice, barleymeal, sharps, and greaves boiled together, with some chopped and boiled stinging nettles added. Celery is sometimes chopped and added to one of the daily meals during the last week of the birds' existence, and this improves the flavor of the flesh. In America, on one or two large duck-rearing plants, watercress is substituted for celery, with, it is stated, excellent results. At this period, too, lumps of raw fat or suet are often rolled into pellets and given to the birds, making them tender and of a rich mellow flavor.

The ducklings should be allowed access to pond water in small troughs or shallow vessels, and this they will utilize for drinking and bathing purposes. Grit should be thrown into the trough, half filling it. At the end of eight or nine weeks the birds are fit to be killed. Care must be observed that the ducklings are not overcrowded, and are kept clean.

Straw is the best material for bedding. This should be removed and shaken with a pitchfork every morning while the birds are feeding in the yard. The mud floor can then be swept, sprinkled with a weak solution of carbolic acid, and dusted with lime before the straw is put on again.

Geese are sold at so much per pound, therefore it behooves every breeder to produce birds possessing as much weight as possible. If the rearer be a farmer he will find it economical and beneficial to let his geese run in stubble fields after harvest, for not only will they get as much corn as they can eat, but they will find pieces of choice greenstuff, of which they are very fond. They will often add to their weight 2 to 5 lbs. each, according to size after being out three or four weeks.

It is the custom of many farmers to give their geese nothing but grass before they are put on the stubble fields; in consequence of this, when first put out the birds are very thin. But it is a great mistake after the stubble has been cleared to return them to that diet, for they will lose almost as much in weight as they have previously gained. After the grain has been cleared from the stubble fields the geese should be given a feed of corn once a day to keep them in good condition.

There is generally not much difficulty in getting geese into prime condition if they are properly treated and in good order. If they are thin and poor they should be fed on corn twice a day, and should be allowed to run on a common or field of good grass. The corn should be put into a trough of water. One feed should consist of barley or Indian corn, and the other may be good oats or wheat. This will bring them on.

Geese in good condition should be confined in a quiet place, shaded from the light, where they cannot see other geese at liberty, and should be kept there for twenty to twenty-five days. It is beneficial to let them out for about fifteen to thirty minutes first thing in the morning, and again in the evening before dusk.

The meals they get should be nutritious, and a mixture of barleymeal, wheatmeal, a little maizemeal, and boiled potatoes, given in a warm state twice a day, if good. About the last or twelve days it is advisable to mix a little finely chopped rough fat with the meal. This has the effect of plumping the birds, rendering their flesh much more palatable. A trough of clean water should be supplied to the birds after the evening meal.

Straw or rough chaff, or, failing this, fine short shavings, should be put in the house or shed where the geese are fattening. If the geese are white the feathers should be kept clean, and for this reason it is best to place food and water outside of the shed. Put the food in a large trough, a little at a time, so that it can all be cleared. If the geese are dirty, they should be allowed to bathe in a pond for a few hours before being killed. They can then be plucked more easily, and the feathers will be more serviceable.

Geese are very hardy, and can stand being shut up for a while in a confined place; but they should have plenty of fresh air. From six to ten thrive better when fattening than if only two or three are confined. If they are fed and treated as described they will add from 4lb to 7lb to their weight under thirty days.

Turkeys are sold by weight, and strange as it may appear to the novice, large birds realize more per pound in proportion than do small ones. For instance, those weighing under 15lb do not realize as much by 3d per pound as do those which weigh 18lb to 20lb., and those weighing over 24lb are worth another 2d. per pound. But as I have previously explained, it is impossible to get the young ones to a suitable weight unless the stock birds are large and of good quality

The fattening process is the same as that which is advocated for geese, but with this difference—turkeys should have broad perches on which to roost. These should not be less than 2ft apart and about 2ft or 2ft 6in from the floor. The house and all the feeding vessels must be kept scrupulously clean, otherwise the birds will not fatten satisfactorily.

Three weeks are considered sufficient time for the hens, and a little longer for the cocks, provided the birds are in good conditions when put up. The chief thing to be borne in mind is that the foods of a saccharine kind. Potatoes, swedes, mangolds, boiled soft and mixed with ground oats, barleymeal, buckwheatmeal ,or maizemeal, constitute good fattening foods.

The French poultry-keepers fatten their turkeys with beetroots, artichokes, or potatoes, boiled and mixed with meal; and they give the birds acorns, chestnuts and walnuts. The latter, they consider, give a delicious flavor to the meat.

Troughs should be used for food. and these are best made with a rail attached, say from 4in to 6in high from the top, so that the birds cannot step inside and upset them. It is advisable. if the weather be fine, to allow the birds out in the morning and evening before being fed, and to feed them outside.

It is best to vary the food as much as possible, as this is greatly inclined to produce a keener relish, which induces the birds to consume more and to fatten quicker. It is a good thing where milk is cheap to give them this to drink, and to mix their meals with it instead of water. While fattening, turkeys require plenty of ventilation and fresh air; and they should have a good supply of grit, sand, and lime rubbish to aid digestion.—B. White in Poultry.

THE ASEEL GAME.

It seems to me that for the country gentleman or the rich fancier who can afford it, no breed of poultry offers greater opportunity for interesting study than the Aseel or true Indian Game. Since I took up the breed some fifteen years ago, its study has afforded me great pleasure. In the first place the Aseel is a rare fowl and it is quite as peculiar as it is rare. It is claimed, upon good authority, that the Aseel is the oldest pure breed of domestic poultry, and the only pure native breed in India. "Aseel" is the name by which the breed is known in its native country, and it is the name adopted in England and America to distinguish it from "Indian Game" (a breed not known to the natives of India) originated in England over 70 years ago by Sir Walter Raleign Gilbert and subsequently improved upon by the Traynes and others, in Cornwall, England. The word "Aseel" is Hindustan and signifies thoroughbred, pure, original. Notwithstanding the fact that there is no poultry standard in India, the Aseel is bred to a fixed type, and has been for centuries. The fowl is chiefly described as follows:

Carriage.—A most important point. Very erect. With drooping stern and tail carried almost in line with the body, the ends of the cock's sickles coming near the ground. The back short, broad and flat, drooping from the shoulders to the root of the tail, which latter should be thick and very muscular. The breast also broad and flat, receding from the neck hackle and meeting the prominent part of the thigh, the wings well up and close to the body, except at the butts, and here slightly detached, the points not throwing beyond the stern.

Eye.—Pearl, white or pink, "daw" or "gander," the smaller the pupil the better.

Head.—Broad and deep, but not long; thick from cheek to cheek, but not too broad at skull, (withoverhanking or projecting brows, as in Malay). Beak very strong at base, rather short and as hard as ivory. Comb pea, wattles scant.

Neck.—Rather short, slightly curved, thick, strong, very muscular, standing out of a pair of level, broad shoulders.

Legs.—Set well forward; thigh full of muscle, rather short; shanks heavy and strong, nicely scaled and rather short.

Plumage.—Scant, hard, tough; the feathers narrow, wirey and the hackles, saddles, and tail coverts of the cock pointed, the quills sound and hard to break.

Color.—Aseels come in various colors. Reds, black, spangled, white and gray being the most common, though any good color looks well in birds of this type.

Handling.—No other domestic fowl is as hard and firm of flesh as the Aseel. In the dark one could easily tell an Asul from any other fowl by handling.

The writer has bred Aseels in several colors and at present keeps reds and whites, the latter breeding as true to color as any white breed. No matter what,color a pure Aseel is a pretty fowl and its very build and style shows that it is "well bred." In truth, I know of no other fowl so interesting to a lover of games as a pure Aseel. Its quaint,aristocratic appearance, its adaptability to the scant accommodations afforded by an ordinary villa poultry pen, the extreme tameness it displays when handled, the staid, appearance of the growing chicks, all go to make the breed attractive and to people who are content to keep a few fowls and whose space is limited the pure Aseel will be found an interesting and beautiful pet. Although comparatively small (cocks 5½ lbs.) the Aseel is the plumpest table fowl yet, and very useful it is said to cross on large breeds,the Aseel blood imparting solidity and big breasts to the crosses. Although Aseels came to England (brought here by British officers stationed in India) many year, ago, the breed did not reach this country more than sixteen years since, and there are very few Aseel breeders in America today, perhaps not a dozen who have the genuine breed. Last year a friend who had imported two lots from India, paying for one cock alone 300 rupees, sent me a stage and from this bird I have fresh blood for the two strains I have been breeding.

As a winter layer the Aseel hen is an improvement over some other kinds, but in summer she becomes broody and of little profit except to sit and rear chicks, and for this purpose I think no hen excels her. She is a steady sitter and quiet, and will submit to any amount of handling. I nearly always select Aseel hens for brooders because more tractable and careful of the chicks.

Fowls become injured in many ways, and it is difficult to ascertain the cause at times, as the farmer cannot find time to give daily observation and note the peculiarities of the individuals. Lameness is caused mostly by alighting from high roosts. When the roosts are high, the fowls will crowd together, each endeavoring to get to the highest point possible, instinct prompting them to do so in order to avoid danger. If they have a long sweep to fly down, they are seldom injured; but where they are compelled to jump down almost under the roost, the result is a bruise, which becomes hard and callous, being known as bumblefoot. When roosting on tree-limbs, young turkeys frequently become lame because of a daily flying to the ground, sometimes partly falling. Warfare among the males, the attacks on the weaker fowls by domineering hens, and accidental injuries are liable to occur among all flocks at any time.—P. H. Jacobs in Farm and Fireside.

DON'T LIKE WORK.

A man will get up at five o'clock in the morning, and chop wood until night, but just as soon as he goes into the poultry business he begins to save labor. If he has an incubator, he wants a regulator that will enable him to jump into bed, cover up, and rise at nine in the morning. To feed the hens twice a day, and give warm water in winter, becomes frightful, but to clean out a poultry house every day is a thought that runs four or five shivers up and down the spinal column every second. If a poultry house is built it must be for his convenience instead of for the hens. If he fails, he will go back to wood chopping, or pulling a cross-cut saw through a four-foot log, without one single whimper. If a man will only work as hard for himself as he has to do for an employer he will be more successful.—Poultry Keeper.

BARRED AND BUFF ROCKS.

I have won the past season at the following shows: Fitchburg, Mass., Stamford, Conn., South Framingham, Mass., Manchester, N. H., New Bedford, Mass. The above Barred Cockerels were all sired by 3d cockerel, 1903, Madison Square Garden, New York winner, 63 cockerels in this class. Reliable Poultry Journal February, 1903, liked this cockerel above all others in the show. I have a few cockerels sired by above cockerel for sale from $4.00 upwards. Standard weight of very even color, barred well all over. If you want to improve your blood these cockerels are what you want. Money returned if birds don't suit you. I have had my pens mated up by one of the leading Poultry Judges in America—4 pens headed by high scoring cockerels. I have also one pen of Buff Rocks. For the cockerel in this pen and two pullets I gave Mr. Higgins, of Orange, Mass., $75. I have not many sittings to dispose of therefore have your orders booked early. My eggs will be from same pens as I breed from myself. Choicest Eggs $2.00 a sitting.

BANTAMS' EGGS IN JULY.—Just the time to hatch winners for the late fall and winter shows. A grand opportunity to get birds of the best strains in existence at the lowest prices. During the month of July I will sell mixed lots of eggs from all of my best pens of imported Bantams (with the exception of Black, Buff and Black Red Japanese; Buff and W. C. Black Polish and Golden Duckwing, and B. B. Red Game, which are positively all that I reserve from this offer). In this offer are included my incomparable pens of Birchen, Red Pyle, Silver Duckwing Games, Muffed, Blue, Red and Spangled Old English Games, Cornish Indian Games, Phoenix Game, Golden and Silver Sebrights, Black and White Rosecombs, Nankins, Light and Dark Brahmas, Black, Buff, White Partridge and Cuckoo Cochins, Barred Plymouth Rock Bantams, Scotch Gray (Dominique), Black Orpington and Langshan Bantams, Ancona Bantams, Black Tailed Gray and Golden Japanese, White Crested White Polish (with V combs and blue legs), Golden Polish and Buff Polish Bantams, White and Colored Silkies, Buff and White Frizzles and Rumpless Bantams. Eggs from all of these pens will be sold in lots at prices as follows: 100 eggs, $20; 60 eggs, $12; 30 eggs, $6; 15 eggs, $3. These lots of eggs will be packed all varieties mixed, just as they are gathered, each egg being marked with name of variety and date. No special selection will be made, and I assume no responsibility for infertility or loss in transportation. But I will have every care used in packing to insure safe delivery, and I am happy to say that at this date, June 15, my Bantam Eggs are remarkably fertile and are producing a high percentage of vigorous chicks. This is the greatest offer in bantams ever made in this country when the high quality of the birds is considered. Nearly every bird in these pens is a winner at the Crystal Palace or other great shows of England, and has been imported direct from Europe by myself. I received 800 from abroad during the months of January and February at a cost of from $5 to $50 each, and challenge any other yard in America to show their equal in high-class quality. I am rearing 2,000 of these birds myself, which will be offered for sale about September 15, at from $5 to $25 per pair. This offer is for the month of July only, as I shall break up my breeding pens about August 1st, to prepare the birds for the fall shows. Orders will be filled in regular rotation as they are received, therefore send them in early, as all orders not filled by August 1 will be returned. I recommend the 100 egg lot in preference to smaller ones, as in this large number the purchaser will probably get enough of each of the best varieties to insure getting a pair or trio. Remember that all of these are high-class, and that there are no scrubs or cheap birds in any of the pens. Faverolles eggs in July will be sold at $4 for 15, from the best pens of English Salmon and Erminie Faverolles. Pens 2 to 6 English Salmon and Ermine Faverolles, $2 for 15 eggs. GEYER'S SCURVY CURE FOR POULTRY was the first article introduced to the public for this purpose, which has been thoroughly tested in the last ten years by many of our brother fanciers who are willing to say with us that there is no other article on the market like this that can be relied on to do its work properly. It is something that the poultry fancier, who appreciates his fine birds, needs very much. What looks more disgraceful than a fine flock of chickens, many, or all of them, having their legs coated with a thick, hard, scabby crust which is called scurvy? It spoils the appearance of the birds and is very annoying to them. It is also contagious. Here we have a sure cure for this ugly disease. By following the directions we guarantee that it will take off that ugly, hard coat and leave the legs clean and smooth and give them their natural color. It also has no equal for healing sores and frosted combs and wattels. It makes them very bright and red. It is just what the exhibitor wants to prepare his birds for the exhibition room. Some of our customers tell us that they have tried it with good results for weak legs. We only ask you to give it a trial. It is put up in tin boxes. Money must accompany all orders. Price, 25 cents. Address, G. A. Geyer, Florin, Pa. 560tf

By Using Geyer's Champion Disinfectant & Vermin Destroyer

There are, in all classes of powders before the public, many calculated for the sure cure of lice and vermin and a dozen other purposes, yet are they reliable, and have they produced the results claimed?

In offering this compound, we offer a powder such as is not before the public, and fills a place that none other can for the purpose intended—a positive, sure disinfectant and destroyer of all vermin that invests either poultry, small animals, those of the barn yard.

It is a perfect destroyer of all disease germs, and produces a healthy odor wherever distributed. It is a sure cure for gapes, in young chicks.

If you are skeptical and don't believe in Powders or compouud because of many worthless ones on the market, we ask, please cast aside your prejudice and give this compound a trial. It is put up in 2 pound boxes. Price 25c. 560tf

Season When the Birds Have Their Vigorous Growth Requires Best Care and Food.

Dr. N. W. Sanborn, Bellingham, Mass.

BAD SMELLING AIR IN BROODERS

These hot summer mornings, as we open the brooders full of late chicks, the sniff of air that reaches our nose is not as fresh as it should be. How can we remedy this? If the brooder has a forced current of warm air passing through it be can increase this by having all the ventilators wide open. Like an incubator, the brooder in hot weather has a very slow current of hot air moving through it. The best we can do is to open the top an inch or two, covering the opening with inch mesh wire netting.

Weekly or half-weekly cleaning of the brooder is not enough in the summer days. Do this every day, spreading some dry earth or ground plaster on the floor. Keep the brooder clean, dry and well ventilated, and you will find that foul air is less likely to greet you when you let out the chicks in the early morning. A dead chick in the brooder will make a smell in a night that will be noticed a yard away from the brooder. Examine the "mother" occupied by hens are likely to be ining chicks do not have to breathe the air from a decaying chick.

RED-MITES IN BROODERS.

Brooders that are put in old poultry houses or near quarters that have been occupied by hens are likely to be invaded by spider lice, or red-mites, as we usually call them. It does not do to wait until the chicks begin to die before thinking that these insects may trouble your chicks. Keep them always in mind and look for them week by week as you go about your poultry work. You will not find them on the chicks by day. They are then in the cracks, or in the cloth that is on the outside of the "mother," or even in the chaff that covers the brooder floor. Dust, dalmation insect powder, or lice powders, have little effect on this tribe of spiders. Kerosene oil sprayed over the inside will kill many of the mites.

Better yet, is the lice-killer that is sold in liquid form and is applied with brush or sprayer. The chicks should be shut out of the brooder and after the lice-killer is applied the brooder should be closed as tightly as possible that the fumes may do thorough work. Brooders should begin the season well whitewashed, and receive a fresh coat with every new lot of chicks. Red-mites have a way of living through cold and heat, lice-killer and white wash, that is a caution to the successful hen-man. Just a few of them left over the winter, soon increase in millions. I have been into hen houses where you could scrape them up in the droppings, on the droppings boards, a red handful in a place.

You cannot expect many eggs from an infested hen house. You surely will fail with chicks if red-mites get under headway in the brooders or roosting coops in mid-summer.

FREE RANGE FOR CHICK AND HEN.

This is the ideal way to care for the laying stock. If we have little room, let the chicks have the best chance. The older birds can have variety of food from the garden and fence corner. Make the yards as large as your room permits. If your yards are small and free from grass, sell part of the stock held through the winter and you will get more eggs on less food. Crowded birds never pay and to get good returns from too many birds in the flock is not to be looked for. Change the yards during the summer. Four foot netting is put up or moved without much trouble and will restrain most birds if the enclosure is one of grass.

Make use of the orchard for hen and chicken runs. It will give you the best possible hen yard and you will see the fruit crop increase from year to year. The hen with a brood of chicks delights to get into an orchard and scratch for insects in the leaves that have collected in every hollow. The insect that drops from the tree is seen and quickly eaten by the busy birds. Raspberry and blackberry bushes grow quickly and make fine shade for chicks. If you would get the best growth out of your late hatched chicks give them free range and plenty of food close at hand.

CLEAN UP.

This is always the proper thing to do. At no time is it more important than in the hot summer day, when filth and moisture breed disease. If the poultry buildings and chicken coops have not been taken good care of right along from the commencement of the spring, get at it now and put them in spick-span condition for the birds that spend half their hours shut in. Clean-out, clean-up, and keep clean, is true of the best needs of the buildings that we use for our flocks. No filth, no lice, no bad air! This is more than half the battle in making poultry pay.

CHICKEN LICE.

Do your chicks have them? "Don't know," do you answer? Look and see; you will find them if the old hen had any part in the hatching or brooding. The hen that hatched her brood in June was loaded with lice and they are mostly to be found now on the heads of the chicks. Take a little lard and oil the whole head of a few of the chicks and see the lice come to the surface!

Never be sure you have no lice on your chicks. Just one hen-hatched chick added to a brooder full of incubator-hatched chicks will give you a bountiful crop of head lice. Keep lice in mind all the warm months. Finding a few on the chicks, go through all those who have not feathers out and oil every head with good lard. Do this to all the heads, as many lice are to be found under the neck near the bill. If the chicks are with hens, dust the birds with a good insect powder every six days for three times. This powder does not injure the nits—they hatch out and must be handled every week for several times.

If you dusted the sitting hens while they were at work you will find it easy to keep lice under, but the hen that has had no attention of this kind will take the best of care to get rid of the crops of lice that will appear. If your chicks are dying from some unknown cause, think of lice. Look for them. Fight them, if you want healthy chicks and paying hens. The male birds need attention. They are careless of the dusting that would rid them of lice. You must do this for them. Birds that are slightly out of condition, from any cause, quickly become loaded with lice, and must be helped by yourself, to get rid of them.

Dust of any kind will kill lice, but I have found that the lice powders sold by our advertisers give better results than any thing that is near at hand. For little chicks the dalmation powder is good to get rid of lice, but I depend upon an ointment to kill the dark head lice of little chicks.

GREEN FOOD.

Chicks and hens never do their best without grass or weeds in some form. They need more than grain and meat to make growth and eggs. Yards and range are getting well picked over by the active birds. Perhaps your yards are now bare and only the dry earth is in view. If this is so, keep this real need of all birds in mind and supply green food to them. There are waste products of garden, such as corn and lettuce to be had. Weeds have made great growth the wet June days we have been enduring and can easily be pulled and thrown into the yards from day to day. This gets rid of the weeds and gives the birds a good thing for their well being. I feed all the lawn clippings to my birds.

I have a home-made arrangement on my mower to catch all grass as it is cut, and this is emptied as often as it gets full. I feed this supply at night so the birds have it then and it is still fresh in the morning when the birds come from the roost. Lawn clippings go a long way in filling the real need for green food. If your supply of clippings is large it is easy to dry the surplus for winter use. At this time of the year be on the outlook for a supply of clover for feeding in the cold months. As you go about you will find some one who has a patch of clover that can be bought for this purpose. Sometimes you can find a large newly seeded dooryard that can be had for the cutting. Cut-clover helps egg production and reduces cost of feeding.

If you can give your growing chicks access to a large field of corn they will attend to the gathering of green food and help the growth of the corn at the same time. Cabbage leaves should be given to the hens rather than wasted. It pays well to plant more than you need for market, that the least desirable of them may be used for poultry feeding.

HOPPER FEEDING.

Your late chicks will surely mature under weight unless they have the very best care and food. In no way can you get better growth on this year's crop of birds than by keeping before them at all times bins of meat-scraps and cracked corn. Give these same birds free range and, my word for it, you will get birds in November that will please you when put on the scales. If you have never tried this method of feeding, do it this season. You will be pleased with the results.—Poultry Keeper.

DOMESTIC POULTRY, THEIR VARIETIES.

By Edward Brown, F. L. S.

In considering the question of the different races of poultry it is necessary to bear in mind that great charges have taken places, and that the effect of domestication has been to greatly increase the production of our birds in one direction or another. We have not space to discuss how these variations have been brought about, but must be contented with accepting the fact. Certain it is that some breeds have increased in size of body to such an extent, as to exceed in bulk the jungle fowl of India, which was the progenitor of our different varieties, all of which, as a rule, have increased both in the direction of meat production and egg-laying qualities. Certain other breeds have developed as egg-layers, and these are usually not nearly so large in body as the others referred to. I mention these facts in order to suggest that we have plastic material upon which to work, and therefore there is a great amount of power in the hands of the breeder, who must constantly keep this fact in view, if he wishes to maintain the good qualities of his birds. The tendency towards reversion is always very strong, and must be guarded against in every conceivable way.

THE EVOLUTION OF SPECIES.

It is impossible for anyone to tell when and how the idea of stock breeding entered into the mind of man; and there can be no doubt that domestic poultry were latest in coming under his influence. Birds, being rapid reproducers, and kept in small numbers merely for the supply of household needs, except in connection with cock-fighting, there was not the same attention paid to them as to the larger stock, and it is for this reason that "barn-door" fowls were chiefly kept. Now that the aspect of things has entirely changed, and it is recognized both at home and abroad that poultry form an important branch of live-stock and that selection brings equal results in the case of fowls as of larger animals, it is seen to be essential that election must be utilized in order to secure the best results. What we wish to impress upon the minds of those who are interested is that the principles which have made this country the great centre for breeding animals, must be applied equally in the case of poultry. It is evident from very cursory examination that in the case of all animals, different breeds suit different districts and conditions. Whilst it is true that some animals are more generally adapted to a variety of circumstances than are others, and therefore may be expected to be more widely distributed, at the same time it is equally true that many districts have races which locally attain their greatest perfection. These special qualities are in many cases owing to a combination of conditions which do not appear to be met with elsewhere. There can be no doubt that in some measure these individual peculiarities are due to natural influences, but not entirely so, as those variations which first became evident without the influence of man have been fixed, and, in many cases, improved.

LOOK BEFORE YOU LEAP.

When we come to look at the question from a purely economic point of view and recognize that variations are natural, then it becomes evident how important it is to study the different breeds. Otherwise the probabilities are that the best selection will not be made. We have to take into account the condition under which the fowls will be kept, because breeds that are suitable where free range can be given may be absolutely out of place in restricted areas. Then there is the question of climate and soil. In the United Kingdom the first does not affect us to the extent that is commonly supposed, because we have here a temperate climate which, with all its faults and variableness and uncertainty, is less liable to extremes than that of most other countries. What is more important than climate to us is the question of the soil. There are certain breeds that will thrive anywhere, whilst other breeds—and some of them the best for certain purposes—will achieve the most satisfactory results only where conditions are favorable. Further, the question of demand for produce has to be taken into account. In some districts chickens are sold at high prices, whilst in other districts the same chicken would probably not sell for much more than half and in the latter case it is generally found that eggs are in considerable demand. Just as in the case of larger stock counties we have what are called "dairy," "beef," or "sheep" districts respectively, so in poultry, though we never use them, the terms "eggs" and "table poultry" districts would be equally applicable. Then, further, there are still more sections of the country where a fair market exists for both eggs and chickens at satisfactory rates, but as a rules in these districts the best qualities of poultry are not sold. Thus it will be seen that one of the chief questions in connection with the development of the poultry industry is that study shall be given to the breeds in order to ascertain which are most suitable to local requirements.

THE BREEDS FOR CHOICE.

At one time the number of breeds of poultry was very limited indeed. If we refer to one of the works (Moubray's) published in the early part of the last century, we find that amongst ordinary fowls the number of breeds mentioned was comparatively small. The list is as follows:—1, Dunghill fowls; 2, Game; 3, Dorkings; 4, Poland; 5, Bantam; 6, Chittagong or Malay; 7, Shackbag; 8, Spanish. Of course in each of these there are several varieties, but when we make comparison it will be seen how much greater is the choice to-day. In the other classes of poultry we find two varieties of turkeys named, that is, the Norfolk and American turkey, whilst mention is made of two varieties of ducks, and the same number of geese. Of course one of the results of domestication in any branch of animal life is, to increase the number of varieties. The tendency toward variation in wild birds is considerable, but amongst these, in many cases,this influence is checked by the fact that the exemplar of such variation is often more easily discernable by its enemies, and is thus killed off, whilst under domestication the disposition is rather towards preserving and encouraging a new characteristic. Probably, however, variation is greater under domestication than under natural conditions, and hence we have an explanation of the great number of breeds, with their sub-varieties, which are now known. A further point is that with the great changes that have come since the introduction of steam, and the opening of the world by commerce and travel, many breeds and varieties have been introduced to us that were, until recently, unknown.

To give a list of all the different races of poultry is unnecessary—their number is legion. We need only to exemplify the bantams, of which there are at least 15 to 20 distinct kinds, as an instance of this fact. It would be very interesting to classify all these varieties in accordance with the countries of their origin, or with their size, or with the color of their plumage, but that is hardly necessary for our present purpose. What we have to do now is to select poultry in accordance with the profit they make, and as this profit is chiefly in the direction of eggs and of flesh, so must the breeds be graded in accordance with these requirements. In classifying breeds according to their economic value we are helped by certain facts which are met with in nature, namely, as Darwin pointed out many years ago, that the use of any function or part of the body tends to the strengthening and increase of that function or part, and as in the case of poultry the egg organs lie in the posterior part of the body, and the meat is generally found in the anterior part of the body, we have at once an indication as to the method of judging by external appearances the economic qualities of any breed.

HOW TO JUDGE A FOWL'S CAPACITY.

The method is simply to draw an imaginary line right through the centre of the body from the shoulders to the legs, which at once affords an indication as to what are the qualities of the fowl. Of course it is better to use hens than male birds in this way. If we find that the greater weight of body is in front of the imaginary line, it is at once evident that the egg organs are comparatively small, whilst the breast qualities are considerably developed, under which conditions we should expect that the fowl will be better upon the table than as an egg producer. Such is found to be the case. On the other hand, if the anterior part of the body is comparatively small and that behind the line is well developed, long and broad, then it shows that the egg organs are expanded ,and that the bird will be much better as a layer than as a meat producer. In the third place, if we find that the balance of body is equal in front and behind, this would suggest that the balance of body is equal in front and behind, this would suggest that the bird is what is called an "all-round" fowl, standing in fact midway between the two more pronounced varieties. Of course in addition to these there is the ornamental class, wherein the specimens met with may be absolutely deficient in either direction, but with these we are not dealing. The above method of classification we adopted some years ago, and have found it universally reliable, but at the same time it must be borne in mind that there are considerable differences; in some cases we find that fowls, especially as they grow older, develop in certain directions, whilst the tendency of age is to reduce economic qualities. This, however, is to be expected. Also is it impossible by this system to determine to a nicety a bird's capabilities. For instance, a small-bodied hen, whose actual measurements are less in the region of the egg organs than are those of a bigger bodied bird, may yet be a better layer, wherefore such a system must be unreliable, unless the comparative bulk of the bird is carefully considered.

A SIMPLE CLASSIFICATION.

The adoption of this system reduces the ordinary classes of poultry into four, namely:

1st.—Laying varieties which are generally non-sitting,and as a rule are small or medium in size of body. They are active in habit, and, whilst the number of eggs produced is large, these eggs are white in shell, whilst the disposition is not so much toward winter egg production as in some other races.

2nd.—Table varieties. In nearly all cases these are either large or large medium in body. In some, however, when in a lean state, the body is rather small, and the reason that they are placed in this class is that the disposition is to put on flesh at certain seasons of the year. Some of the table varieties are rather delicate, and require special conditions. This statement applies to the best of them. A good table fowl should be light in bone, and whilst some can claim to be so, their chief use is for crossing.

3rd.—General purpose varieties, a combination, with a loss of a little ,in one or another direction, of the qualities found in the two former classes. In many instances they are yellow in flesh, but they have an important advantage in that they are often good sitters, mothers, and winter layers.

Laying (non-sitting) Varieties.

Hamburghs.	Andalusians.
Campines.	Redcaps.
Minorcas.	Houdans.
Leghorns.	Scotch Greys.
Anconas.	Barbezieux.

Table Varieties.

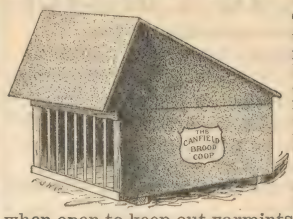
Dorkings.	Crevecoeur.
Indian Game.	Coucou de Malines
Game.	Courtes Pattes.
La Bresse.	Du Mans.
La Fleche.	Orpingtons.

General Purpose Varieties.

Plymouth Rocks.	Langshans.
Wyandottes.	Faverolles.

Brahmas.

It should be noted, however, that some of the breeds named above have several varieties, and that certain of them are near the border line of another class. For instance, the Scotch Grey is put in the non-sitting class, although there are those who contend that it ought to be included amongst the table varieties, and the same is also true of the Houdan, whilst there are those who state that the Buff Orpington should be added to the table varieties and not be included in the general purpose section. These differences, however, are small, and we have placed them in the position which is most generally accepted, though possibly in a few years transpositions will have to be made, owing to the general changes which constantly recur.—The Indian Fowl Fanciers' and Farmers' Journal.



GOGGLES FOR CHICKENS; WHAT NEXT?

Our readers will be amused with a suggestion that is being made, "in the name of humanity," to supply chickens with goggles. Among the recent invention which have been brought out for our dumb animal or bird friends is a pair of goggles to be placed on chickens to prevent them from picking out the eyes of one another. A couple of pugnaciously-inclined birds on a farm, it is said, can do a lot of harm to the others, and as a protection against damage being sustained to the eyes, it is proposed, says "Science Siftings," to equip the members of the flock with a pair of goggles. The shape of these protectors is such that by springing them apart and placing them over the head of the bird they will stay there of their own accord. The frames are fitted with discs of glass or mica. These spectacles are designed for very high-bred fowls [We should think so.—Ed.] and are meant to prevent the owner from loss as well as the chickens from hurt.—Fanciers' Gazette, England.

DO BIRDS REASON?

In the "Windsor Magazine" the ever-interesting question, "Do Animals Reason?" is the subject of an article by Charles E. Branch, who describes the work done by M. Pierre Hachet-Souplet and his fellow scientists in the Institute of Zoological Pcychology, which has been founded in Paris and is supported by the government. Amongst other items, an ingenious explanation of the mystery of bird migration is given: The faculty of direction demonstrated by the Courier-Pigeon and migratory birds has recently been occupying his attention, and the results of his experiments lead to the conclusion that there is no extra sense in birds that enables them to find their way over long distances, but their visual organs are wonderfully developed, and their memories most retentive. One remarkable hypothesis advanced to account for the ability of birds to find their way over long distances suggested that they did so by recognizing on their return voyage from any place the varying currents of air, magnetic and atmospheric, encountered by them on the outward trip. In other words, they felt their way, remembering one current after another in the reversed order to which they had previously experienced them.

The adjourned session of the 1904 meeting of the American Poultry Association will be held on the World's Fair grounds, St. Louis, Thursday, October 27. Friday, October 28, has been designated by the management and accepted by fanciers as Poultry Day at the World's Fair.

We publish in full in this issue the rules and regulations of the poultry department at St. Louis, as revised by Col. Mills and Supt. Orr, and authorized by the management in the new edition of the Live Stock Premium List just issued.

The cash prizes offered by a number of specialty clubs are printed in this new edition of the World's Fair Premium List. This is rather a surprise to many who thought only the regular prizes would be allowed space in the latter.

The Hon. Joseph P. Hilldorfer, Pittsburg, Pa., is spending some time at St. Louis; in fact, celebrated the Glorious Fourth there. "Joe" says the Black Minorca breeders should make a showing of the "Royal Blacks" at the World's Fair that will knock all exhibits in the shade. And your "Uncle Joseph" is a leader who practices what he preaches, consequently will make a very large entry of his famous blacks at St. Louis. The fact that nothing has been done by the American Black Minorca Club to advance the interests of the breed at the World's Fair should spur on all breeders of that variety to get a "move on" to make a "big showing." Even an eighth prize won there will prove of more value than many a blue ribbon at a minor show.

Uncle Seldon, of the Pittsburg Fanciers' Club, has been at St. Louis looking over the art galleries and "coming down the pike" at the Fair. He will go again in October with "Jimmy" Skiles to attend the poultry and pigeon shows. These Pittsburg fanciers believe in traveling about and learning how to do things. That's why the Pittsburg show is up-to-date and a winner.

Lest we forget! General John L. Cost, the champion shortcake eater of the world, announces his famous Hagerstown Fair in the advertising columns of this issue. Shows may come and go, but the Hagerstown Show goes on year after year,, greater and better as experience suggests improvements. The man at the helm is the same liberal, aggressive and generous manager as in years gone by, and the annual fanciers re-union at Hagerstown is the event of the year in the fancy of the east. A prize won at Hagerstown is a bread winner, to use one of John L. Cost's expressions. It has an intrinsic advertising value. The slogan for October 11 to 14, 1904, is, "Meet me at the Great Hagerstown Show!"

There will be plenty of time to get from Hagerstown to St. Louis in time for the opening of the big poultry show at the latter, arrangements having been made to ship from the former direct to World's Fair grounds.

Entries for St. Louis close September 10, positively, five full weeks in advance of the show.

Minneapolis 48, New York 29, is the result of the vote of the executive committee of the American Poultry Association for the annual meeting place of the latter. Members of the old society who will attend the meeting in the Flour City of the Northwest will not regret it. The fanciers out there are a whole-souled body of men whose reputation as hosts is most favorably known to all who have had the pleasure of meeting with them in the past.

The icy breezes that prevail in Minneapolis in January should act beautifully on some of the spellbinders of the A. P. A. in cooling and reducing some of the hot-air that annually escapes them when allowed to do so by an accommodating presiding officer. The little sign busy men have posted on their desks which reads, "Be Brief," is a pretty good rule for members of the A. P. A. to observe at the annual sessions. Time is always short at the latter and what the non-talking members desire is to listen to facts that apply to the poultry industry, the standard, and the society itself, and not to oratorical displays that simply resolve themselves into personal bouquet throwing, and, incidentally, into more or less acrimonious personalities.

It is the same thing at poultry club banquets and dinners. If some lengthy talkers felt as their listeners did, they would supply themselves with a safety valve which will check their speech at a time it has reached its fullest bloom and consequently not impair digestion of the festive crowd that surround the well laden tables at such functions.

If we stop to consider the vast amount of irrelevant talk at meetings of the nature of the American Poultry Association, the idea of issuing a convenient version of the proceedings at the annual sessions is a very good one. It takes money to buy printers' ink suitably distributed over pages of a pamphlet. To print all the talk pro and con that took place in the Revision Committee meetings and the annual gatherings of the American Poultry Association would fill very large books, and the chances are a good lot of stuff would never be read. Poultry men want the meat, not the fat, bones, hide and hair.

We are aware that Secretary Orr is anxious to print the proceedings in full of the meetings held by the American Poultry Association at Indianapolis and Rochester, but the financial condition of the treasury did not warrant the large outlay such an undertaking demands. Furthermore, when Secretary Orr did condense the language used at the discussions and deliberations of the meetings, much fault was found in some quarters. Yet it was in many respects a boon to many members to get the condensed account and it is to be borne in mind that the work of condensation is not an easy task. It takes time and ability.

Messrs. William Cook & Son, who are probably the most extensive breeders and advertisers of poultry in England and Australia, and started recently in the United States to build up a trade and establish a plant similar to those in England and Africa, placed a card in the American Fancier and in settling their account wrote: "We have been very pleased with the number of enquiries and orders that we have received from the American Fancier and probably shall resume advertising in the fall." Quality of circulation again proves its value, together with the fact that the columns of the American Fancier are not a continual crimson sunset of fulsome eulogies devoted to a few favored big advertisers at the expense of the men that put up the coin to keep a poultry paper alive. By reading the unsolicited testimonials from some of the best fanciers, breeders and exhibitors of poultry in the United States and Canada, that appear now and then in these columns during the year, the real usefulness to the fancy of The American Fancier is readily apparent.

We learn from a reliable source that Mr. D. Lincoln Orr, president of the American Poultry Association, will hold an important meeting with Mr. Thomas E. Orr, secretary of the same body, at the latter's home on or near the banks of the placid Ohio, Beaver, Pa., next week. When that Scotch-Irish-Buckeye-Orange county-American pair get through, the A. P. A. atmosphere will clear, and sunny, bright skies will envelop the destinies of the old association for the next year at least.

It is rumored that there will be a show at Cleveland, Ohio, again this winter.

CHICKEN POX.

This is a disease characterized by a peculiar pox-like eruption on the head appendages and somewhat over the body, mostly under the wings and thighs. It is highly contagious and, to a certain degree, has a fatal tendency, and should be placed, in the matter of care, precaution and treatment, with such diseases as roup, canker, cholera and other malignant affections. Just where to place the cause for pox in chickens is rather difficult, but we should seek for it in the same line as the just mentioned diseases. It assumes an epidemic form as they, has a fatal tendency as they, though not so virulent perhaps, and in manner of attack, progress and resolution behaves very much as they.

Anyone having seen chicken pox in infants cannot fail to recognize it in his fowls. The eruption looks much like a pimple at first, but as the poison pervades the system deeper the pimple changes into a miniature boil, with a characteristic areola of red for a border. Matter forms, and altogether a genuine pox assumes, which leaves a well-marked pit after shedding a scab. At times the pox coalesce (or run together) and make one large ulcerous sore involving the entire comb, wattles or patches of skin surface. In progress and resolution it occupies a time all the way from one week to three, according to the severity of attack or success of treatment.

Treatment.—Consists first of all in isolation of all the effected birds and thorough fumigation with sulphur and carbolic acid of the house and coops. Being a constitutional disease internal remedies must be made resource to in the form of principally sulphur and tartar emetic. Both are preferably administered in the homoepathic tablet form of one hundredth grain, say a tablet about every four hours. If not obtainable in the about preparation get some reliable druggist to put the latter up in pill form. The former can be given in the feed. In the first stage, when considerable fever is present, tincture gelseminum, 10 drops to a pint of water as dark will answer. Local application must be dispensed with in this disease. Citrate of magnesia is also recommended as a valuable remedy, but mostly on the theory that open bowels are an essential to such eruptive processes. A teaspoonful to a dozen fowls mixed in the feed seems sufficient.

We might also mention that if the eruption manifests itself principally in the form of small pimples, or minute boils looking like acne,the remedy perhaps most efficacious it rhus tox, twenty drops in a pint of water. These remedial means, with complete isolation and disinfection, should bring favorable results in the majority of cases.—W. F. R.

FROM 20 INCUBATORS TO 20,000

That is the unbeaten record of the Prairie State Incubators: 20 sold first year—20,000 sold in 1903. Prominent duck and poultry breeders favor the Prairie State because it's always reliable and gives high per cent hatches. The United States Government uses them exclusively. Be sure to send for our free, illustrated catalog full of pictures—among them photos of incubator rooms where 20 to 80 of our machines are in active operation.

THE GREAT WORLD'S FAIR PRIZE LIST.

The extended and complete classification of prizes for the Live Stock Department of the Universal Exposition, just received from Chief Charles F. Mills, is generally considered by the most eminent authorities in this technical line of effort as complete and a most creditable standard for the next century.

This large and imposing volume, when compared with the previous compilations of like character, make as much more favorable a record for the Universal Exposition as the incomparable exhibits in all the departments of human endeavor now assembled at St. Louis excel all previous displays made at former world's fairs.

President Francis, the premier executive of the universal expositions and the leading favorite with home and foreign promoters of such important and effective agencies for advancing the highest civilizations, and Director of Exhibits Skiff, with his brilliant record for successful management in connection with the Columbian and Paris expositions, have given the announcement, rules, classification of premiums published in the final edition of the prize list of the Live Stock Department of the World's Fair their unqualified endorsement.

Hon. F. D. Coburn, the able and popular chief of the live stock exhibit, until recently compelled by ill health to resign, and his secretary, Colonel Charles F. Mills, since the organization of the Department of Live Stock, have given to the world, in this work, a new and high standard in classification and rules pertaining to the exhibition of domestic animals.

Colonel Charles F. Mills, now chief, and Mr. Coburn, whose distinguished services prompted the exposition to appoint him honorary chief of the department, have made the following announcement in the final edition of the prize list, which statement has been approved by the director of exhibits, F. J. V. Skiff, and confirmed by the president of the Universal Exposition, David R. Francis, viz:

"The Universarl Exposition of 1904 will provide accommodations and opportunity at St. Louis for complete displays of the useful recognized breeds of domestic animals and fowls and their exhibition and judging to the best advantage, without charge for entries, stalls or pens in any division.

"The wide extent of the classification, a list of prizes never before equalled in extent of generosity, together with the ample and attractive provisions intended for the comfort and exhibition of the entries will as a whole be fully in keeping with the magnitude and importance of the industry to which they pertain. All these have been planned upon a scale and breadth of liberality heretofore unknown and suggest every facility for the instruction and entertainment of visitors interested in animal husbandry and its wonderful recent progress, as well as all who would know more of their reach and what they imply.

"The appropriation of $280,000 of the Exposition money for prizes to live stock, to which have been added large sums from states and associations of breeders, make possible and assures in each class a presentation of and competition between the best specimens in existence—an assemblage of quality whereby will be determined the present summit level of human skill and endeavor in animal development.

"That the efforts much give wholesome impetus to an advancement and resetting of breeding, feeding and exposition standards far surpassing any heretofore attained is the earnest conviction of those who have wrought its plans and provided the ways and means for its making."

TABASCO SAUCE.

Robby could make a fortune if he would enter the airship contest at St. Louis.

He has enough hot air for a dozen airships.

Santos wouldn't be in it.

Just think of it! A whole page devoted to that broken-down, no good association!

And not a word in the whole shooting match on which anyone could form a new association.

Keep it up, Mr. Robinson, keep it up. You are hurting nothing but your own paper.

Only for Drev., I could give you several raps that would make you think the Bunker Hill monument had tumbled on your cranium.

No judges appointed till September 10th, eh? Well, well; still we are making history!

Hully Gee! But what a lot of coin the boys are putting up in specials for St. Louey.

Wish some one would put up a 1st and 2d on lobsters so "me and that man from Bosting" could have a race.

Talk about races puts me in mind of the recent race won by Prof. John L. Cost.

Strawberry shortcake, did you say? Yes, and that John L. was a winner by seven lengths.

Dave Nichols may be first when it comes to buying $2 Standards, but on eating strawberry shortcake?

He puts me in mind of the recent Cornell boat crews—too much Foote's. See!

Charley Welles had to mortgage those Barred Rocks of his to get coin to get strawberry shortcake enough.

Billy Holmes sent word to me by Homer Davenport. No, no! I mean Homer Pigeons.

Next time, Billy, send it by wireless via Cape Cod and Plymouth Rock.

But look out for Robinson. He may be roundabout.

Billy also said that they caught one lone lobster.

As me and Robby are still free, wonder who could have been foolish enough to, well, yes, pull out the cork?

What a pair of fishermen Cost and Cleveland would make!

Things are rather quiet now.

Curtis in Europe and Hewes at St. Louey.

Wait till the band begins to play, then you'll see the monkeys commence to dance.

Leaving all jokes aside and for the good of of the poultry fraternity, I most respectfully ask Mr. J. H. Robinson to write and publish in Farm-Poultry a constitution and by-laws such as would best suit an organization as he has in his mind.

"Glittering generalities" don't count these days. Theory may be nice and all that, but practical demonstration is what convinces.

I notice in the papers that the Com. of 3 signs themselves, Com. of the Am. Poultry Assn.

Would like to know by what right have they to such a title.

The A. P. A. never appointed such a committee, and, furthermore, the Association refused at Rochester to have anything to do with the affair.

Would suggest to the Com. of 3 that they saw loose and float their own boat.

Frank B. White. Well, well, Frankie; glad you are in the electro business. Every paper (poultry or farm) has your phiz in it.

Next time you sit for a photo do not look as if the L. C. Co. had landed the contract that you were after.

I see McReynolds is after Thomas Electric Orr.

Mac is editor of the Southern Poultry Journal, and in an editorial on Orr's egg contest makes a very strong argument.

It is the best article of its kind I have ever read and I agree with you, Mac.

The article preceding it, Mac, may be true, but it reads as if you had a chip on your shoulder. Don't be an alligator.

The A. P. A. has does and will make mistakes, but on the whole it has done a great good, and with the best talent in America will do more good work. Get in line, Mac.

And let us stand shoulder to shoulder. Attention, Poultry Breeders of America! Guide right! Front! Forward march!

WEST POINT.

FLOOR FOR POULTRY HOUSE.

Some poultry keepers prefer the dirt floor, some the plank and some cement. The advantage seems to lie with the cement floor. They cost but little more than the plank floor, last longer and are rat proof. It is easily cleaned and does not hold infection. You can clean them out thoroughly and scrub clean, as dirt lets loose from cement more quickly than boards. Many prefer the earth floor because it absorbs the filth and is soft to the foot; but in cleaning the earth floor so much of the top layer must be taken off and this calls for fresh earth or gravel as an extra filling. Earth floors are inclined to be damp, and it is better not to have a floor that absorbs filth, as this tends to finally keep disease among the fowls. Those who prefer cement floors often cover them with sand or fine gravel to several inches depth above the cement. This absorbs droppings under the roosts and is soft to the fowls feet in other parts and is easily taken out.—Twentieth Century Farmer.

This is to certify that I have sold to Ralph Lyons, the Buff Leghorn specialist of East Kingston, N. Y., my entire stock of best birds in S. C. Buff Leghorns, including all my N. Y. and Boston Winners. They are the best in the land.

THE USUAL GOOD BUSINESS.

Editor American Fancier:

The old reliable American Fancier has done its usual good business for me and my "ad." will always be found in it whenever in any other papers.

WATSON WESTFALL.

Sayre, Pa., June 20, 1904.

Mr. Howell, associate editor of The American Fancier, will furnish weekly reports on the egg and poultry market, and answer all questions submitted to him relating to commercial and practical poultry keeping. When replies are requested to be sent by letter, stamps must be enclosed and letters addressed to George E. Howell, 70 Christopher St., New York City.

Eggs.—Receipts for week fell to 75,000 cases, which is a sure sign an advance for fancy stock is in sight. New York state and nearby fancy stock selling at 21c. for white, and 19c. for brown and mixed colors. Best western, 18½c.; Kentucky and other southern, 13 to 16c. per dozen.

Poultry.—Thirty carloads, live, and 5,750 packages dressed, and prices have fallen to 11c. on fowls, nearby springers to 18c., western and southern 16c., turkeys 10c. per pound. Western ducks, 70 to 80c. per pair.

Dressed broilers, Phila. fancy, 28 to 30c.; small, 20 to 25c.; western, small to large sizes, 16 to 22c.; fowls, 11½c; turkeys, 14 to 15c. per lb.; ducks, best Long Island and eastern, 16c.; fair to good, 14 to 15c.; Penn. and Va., 14 to 15c. White Squabs, $2.25 to $2.37½ per dozen; dark, $1.50 to $1.75 per dozen.

Coloring eggs with coffee to make them brown for the English market seems to be taken seriously. Let me say again, the color of the shell will not affect the inside for table purposes, or make a fresh egg of a stale one.

Try and feed to produce a nice rich colored yolk and let the shell take care of itself. Not all white eggs have pale yolks, neither do all brown ones have high colored ones.

The cook is the only one who can produce any difference in the eating qualities of two eggs of different colors, but laid by the same flock.

In the meantime Little Old New York will still continue to clamor for its 70,000 cases a week of white eggs and takes its coffee with the dessert.

In my business I find the majority of fresh eggs are white in summer, and in winter ninety-nine cases out of a hundred will be brown. Why? Because the Leghorn is a summer layer, and in winter the heavier feathered breeds do the laying.

New York being a city of hotels, naturally prefers a white egg, because it looks better on a side dish, but the kind the hotel steward buys for the kitchen is the western farmer's brown egg, with the rich-colored yolk, and the man that palms off a pale yolk in a coffee colored shell is liable to find the atmosphere around his telephone becoming so torrid the insulation is in danger of burning out.

While on the subject, let us take a look at the price of eggs compared with this and other years, prices having remained stationary for some time and now about due for a change.

May	20	18½	18	14
July	21	20	23	14

This price is for the despised white eggs; the browns were 2c per dozen cheaper. As I said before, in the winter months no such difference in price is made. A fresh brown egg being held as high as a fresh white one, and dominates the market because there is more of them laid.

The Petaluma Weekly Poultry Journal says the hens of Petaluma have laid three million four hundred thousand dozens of eggs during the year of 1903. March, April and May seem to be the months of the big yields on the coast, same as in the east.

Great country, California. Everything done on a big scale, yet, strange to tell, despite the volumes of eggs and enormous flocks of fowl, they do not have enough chicken meat to supply the demand and have to send on this side of the Rocky Mountains for the deficiency.

While we speak of our poultry in the singular, they are quoted at so much per dozen on the coast.

Instances have been recorded where careful and painstaking feeders have been able to make a profit by purchasing fowls which are about to be placed on the market by farmers and others; then, by possessing a superior knowledge of fowl fattening methods, bring these fowls so secured up to a state of perfection such as to create for them a demand taxing the fullest capacity of his plant.

Such an establishment, located within equal distance of the New York or Philadelphia markets, is described in the columns of a contemporary, but the most striking part of the whole matter is the fact that it is not necessary to consign to either of these markets. The popularity of the goods is such that the smaller and nearer by towns use the whole output, something like 500 birds a week.

Over the fattening pens, having a capacity of 5,000 fowls, are pigeon runs and a squab breeding establishment, where thousands of pairs of pigeons are producing squabs which weigh as much as two and one-half pounds to the pair. In this case the New York market is the mecca sought to convert this vast supply of game meat into money.

But this story, as interesting and instructive as it is, is disappointing in some respects. For instance, what becomes of the by-products?—which must be enormous where so many birds are propagated and dressed every week. An Armour would make a million from this source alone.

COMPOSITION OF EGGS.

R. W.. B., Kearneyville, W. Va., writes: "Please state composition of the ash of an egg."

Answer by Prof. Jame E. Rice, Cornell University, Ithaca, N. Y.:

The analyses below are taken from Dr. Jordon's book on Feeding Animals. One of the most valuable chapters on feeding poultry which has ever been prepared was written for this book by Prof. H. W. Wheeler of Geneva, N. Y.

Fresh egg with the shell analyzed: 11.4 shell, 65.7 water, 8.9 fat, 11.4 protein, .8 ash, aside from the shell. Of the dry matter of the egg: 3.5 per cent is ash, not including the shell, 49.8 per cent. is protein, 3.5 percent is ash, 38.6 per cent is fat. Of the total dry matter of the entire egg: 35.6 per cent is ash, 25.9 is fat, 33.3 per cent is protein.

The shell of the egg consists almost entirely of carbonate of lime. The above analysises are made from 400 eggs, representing several different breeds, and therefore may be considered reliable.

KEEPS HIM IN BUSINESS.

Editor American Fancier:

Never stop my classified advertisement in your paper unless you want to put me out of business, or until I notify you to that effect. I have had a grand trade the past year and the egg trade is the best I ever had, thanks to the American Fancier. Your paper has brought me three times as much business as all other mediums combined, which is saying something. It brings the kind of customers we all want—men who want the best and are willing to pay for it.

T. E. Orr, Superintendent.

Entries of poultry, pigeons and pet stock must be filed with the Chief of the Department of Live Stock on the prescribed form on or before September 10, 1904. An exhibitor of poultry, pigeons or pet stock will be permitted to enter and present for award not to exceed four entries in any single competition.

All poultry, pigeons and pet stock must be exhibited in these coops. See announcement following, by committee of American Poultry Association.)

TO EXHIBITORS OF POULTRY AT THE UNIVERSAL EXPOSITION OF 1904.

The undersigned committee of the American Poultry Association has completed arrangements with the Universal Exposition of 1904 whereby this committee is to receive, coop, feed, care for, exhibit and return to their respective owners upon the close of the show, the poultry, pigeons and pet stock exhibited at the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, October 24 to November 5, 1904, inclusive.

The committee has arranged for standard-size coops, of the proper size for turkeys, geese, ducks, poultry and pet stock, and will provide at the Exposition grounds an ample suppiy to meet all requirements.

The committee will provide feed and water for all the poultry, pigeons and pet stock on exhibition, their cleanliness, and the necessary utensils for the same, and furnish all necessary help for the proper feed, care and exhibition of the poultry, pigeons and pet stock and its shipment to and from the Exposition.

The committee, for all the necessary accommodations other than the barns, including coops, furniture and all services in connection with the shipment, feed, care and exhibition of poultry, pigeons and pet stock specified above and such as are usually provided for such exhibition, agree to accept from exhibitors in full for first-class service and accommodations, one dollar for single exhibits, including pet stock, two dollars for breeding pen and fifty cents for each pigeon.

The committee will assume all responsibility to and for exhibitors in connection with the exhibition of poultry, pigeons and pet stock at the World's Fair, but assumes no responsibility for the loss of exhibits in course of shipment or by disease, handling or accident while on exhibition.

In estimating the cost necessary for the receiving, cooping, care, exhibition, return, and other expenses at the show, this committee has made a most careful estimate based upon the number of probable entries. While it is not thought the sum named will more than equal expenses, yet if any surplus should result the amount will be employed for additional testimonial prizes to be awarded to the exhibitors winning prizes at the show.

For further information concerning the foregoing, address Henry Steinmesch, Chairman, World's Fair Grounds, St. Louis, Mo.

GAME FOWLS.

At the Bantam Club exhibition, which will take place in October at Paris, we shall certainly see some very fine species of Game, principally the breeds of our "collaborateur" A. Vlasto. Cock fighting is a very favorite sport in England. It is well known that our neighbors are lovers of the impressive spectacle of two feathered duellists rushing upon each other with fury, and piercing, as with swords, their sharp spurs into the bleeding flesh.

Although perfected during modern epochs, the Game fowl is of ancient and even classic origin. Buffon treating of the cock in his admirable natural history remarks that, "Men have been known to cultivate this antipathy which Nature has established between cock and cock with so much art that the combats between these birds have become spectacles worthy of exciting the curiosity of polished people, and, at the same time, the means of developing or spreading on them that precious ferocity which is, they say, the germ of heroism."

The ancients used to amuse themselves with cock-fighting. The Isle of Rhode was renowned for the breeding, education, and putting to fight of Game cocks. The Athenians have tried to make quails fight. The struggles of these feathered gladiators were looked upon not only as a form of amusement, but also as an example and encouragement for warriors. Themistocles, in order to excite his soldiers against the Persians, had some cocks brought to the border of his camp and launched them one against the other. "See," said the Greek general to the soldiers, who were watching with interest the events of the struggle, "the indomitable courage of these birds. They, however, have no other motive than the desire to conquer, while you who fight for your homes, for the tombs of your fathers, for your liberty, you hesitate before the enemy." This language, and the spectacle which accompanied it, inflamed the courage of the Athenians; they rushed forth with ardor to the combat, and that was the occasion of the victory of Salamine.

The English, without attaching the idea of warlike excitation to cock-fighting, addict themselves to it with pleasure. It is the complement of the violent distraction with which this vigorous and resisting nation amuse themselves. At home, where delicacy and popular sentimentality have never been able to tolerate, except in the cities of the Midi, bull-fighting, cock-fighting is prohibited by law. There scarcely exists any public for these combats. Singularly enough, some private exhibition of these struggles, which often terminate in the death of the vanquished, and the exhaustion of the conqueror, who comes out of the arena bleeding, crippled, and scarcely in a better condition than its adversary, take place in the northern departments. This is no doubt owing to the influence of the proximity of England.

Game cocks are sought by amateurs, without any intention of using them for fighting purposes, on account of their elegance, their proud gait, and the beauty of their plumage. A large number of varieties are of very small size. There are, however, some large breeds standing high on the feet, with the carriage of a bird of prey. Game cocks have combs—that is to say, they are born with combs. This appendage, however, is taken away in order to allow the adversary less hold. The feet of both the cock and hen (the hen also lends herself to the struggle) are olive green. English Game are very tall, very high on their legs, with small head, from which the piercing eyes of the bird of prey flash fire. The beak is massive and curved at the point. The thighs and the back are full of muscles, and denote vigor. The spur is strong, and the plumage set close like armor. The fighting fowls of the north of France are equally tall, and also have a powerful bent beak and solid spur. The Malays and the Indians are also esteemed varieties.

It is curious that duelling should be allowed in France among men, and yet prohibited as regards these birds. In England, on the contrary, duelling is prohibited, while cockfighting is permitted. The English are more humane than us. This false sensitiveness on our part as regards cock-fighting is not founded on any just sentiment. Is not the cruelty of the butcher cutting the throat of the defenceless lamb worse than that of the bird seller organizing a struggle between two cocks of which the instinct is combative? The answer is that the butcher kills in order to furnish his cutlets. But for the animal it matters little what becomes of its body after it has been struck dead. The excuse of alimentation is not absolute. First one can put in the pot the cock killed in combat, and it then becomes an important item in the pantry. It might even be said that the Game cock, being of a fighting nature, one submits it to a privation equivalent to a punishment by confining it to a pacific cage, and not permitting it to display its courage and develop its strength. Not allowing Game cocks to fight is much the same as preventing children from crying, running, and, later on, from having recreation.

But prejudice and sentimental routine are stronger even than reason, and the same people who learn without a frown that hundreds of Japanese and Russian sailors have gone to the bottom owing to the action of the torpedoes, and who admire with serenity the terrible effects of these engines—incomparable destroyers of human lives—would not pardon the publicist who proposed the re-establishment of cock-fighting, and would imprecate the government who authorized them. Madame Severine would open her flood-gates, and the members of the Protection Society would give themselves up with frenzy to their bailiff instincts.

Let us forget then the things which our sweet hypocrites allow, and content ourselves with conserving Game breeds as degenerated breeds, all of them being perfect and admirable birds in all respects other than their nature. They are the cocks of the walk and warriors of parade, like some of the generals of the antechamber.—J. Desclozeaux, in L'Echo de L'Aviculture.

EDITOR TRAFFORD EXPLAINS.

Editor American Fancier:

"West Point" is after us because of a statement made that H. T. Brown was a winner in Barred Plymouth Rocks last winter at Madison Square Garden, which statement was published in connection with matter which Mr. Brown furnished us under head of "Colony Houses, Colonizing, etc.," which appeared in the May issue of Poultry Success.

Now, "West Point," you say Mr. Brown "did not even exhibit at Madison Square Garden last winter." So far we will have to correct you. Refer, if you please, to the list of exhibitors in Barred Plymouth Rocks in the official catalogue of last winter's Madison Square Garden Show and see if you do not find the name of Barr Rox Farm. If you do, we will remind you that Mr. Brown, to whom you refer, is the proprietor of this farm.

As to the statement that "Mr. Brown's Barred Plymouth Rocks were winners at Madison Square Garden last winter," we admit this is a case of a little too much of taking things for granted.

We are certain Mr. Brown would not expect credit for something to which he was not entitled, and he had nothing to do with our publishing the item that he was a Madison Square Garden winner. We aim to be exact in all our statements, but occasionally through an inadvertence, as in this case, a mistake is made. As soon as we discover this, or our attention is called to it, we are always ready to make correction. We have no favoritisms to show in the conduct of Poultry Success, and certainly our readers would not charge us with being intentionally unfair to any one.

We thank "West Point," as we would thank any other reader for pointing out at any time any mistake we may make.

We thank "West Point" sincerely for calling our attention to this regretted and unintentional mistake on our part. When you "catch us napping again" we hope you will, as in this instance, call our attention to the fact.—Henry Trofford, editor Poultry Success.

COST LOOKS LIKE CLEVELAND.

SHELTON, Conn., June 25—John L. Cost, of Hagerstown, Md., who has been visiting with friends here, has returned to his home.

Mr. Cost is almost a perfect double of Grover Cleveland, and his resemblance to the ex-president leads to funny things sometimes.

While he was visiting here he, with a party of friends, went to the seashore for the purpose of enjoying a day's fishing, a sport of which Mr. Cost is very fond.

There had been a rumor prevalent about this vicinity at that time to the effect that ex-President Cleveland was about to visit friends here, and therefore when one of the party gave out the tip that Mr. Cost was the ex-president, he was readily believed, and the clammers and fishermen were soon gathered about the party shyly anxious to speak with the great man.

Mr. Cost entered into the spirit of the joke and was very urbane and friendly, shaking hands with them all, which so delighted the worthy men as to cause them to assure Mr. Cost that they had voted for him twice, and hoped to be able to do so once more.

Finally the party secured the boat they were looking for and went out fishing. It had but little luck managing, however, to catch one lone bass, quite a good-sized one, after several hours trying.

As they approached the shore again a party of fishermen, just going out, hailed them and asked what luck they had.

One of the party gravely lifted the lone bass to view, then dropped it in the bottom of the boat, and after groping about a bit, again raised the same one. He did this half a dozen times, the exclamations of the fishermen growing louder and louder with each exhibit.

Finally one lank specimen drawled out: "Well, Grover did always hev the derndest luck fishing, anyhow."

The party hugely enjoyed the joke, and as the fishermen did not know the difference no one was injured, but Mr. Cost was called Grover more than any other name while he remained here.—Evening Sentinel.

BANTAMS' EGGS IN JULY.—Just the time to hatch winners for the late fall and winter shows. A grand opportunity to get birds of the best strains in existence at the lowest prices. During the month of July I will sell mixed lots of eggs from all of my best pens of imported Bantams (with the exception of Black, Buff and Black Red Japanese; Buff and W. C. Black Polish and Golden Duckwing, and B. B. Red Game, which are positively all that I reserve from this offer). In this offer are included my incomparable pens of Birchen, Red Pyle, Silver Duckwing Games, Muffed, Blue, Red and Spangled Old English Games, Cornish Indian Games, Phoenix Game, Golden and Silver Sebrights, Black and White Rosecombs, Nankins, Light and Dark Brahmas, Black, Buff, White Partridge and Cuckoo Cochins, Barred Plymouth Rock Bantams, Scotch Gray (Dominique), Black Orpington and Langshan Bantams, Ancona Bantams, Black Tailed Gray and Golden Japanese, White Crested White Polish (with V combs and blue legs), Golden Polish and Buff Polish Bantams, White and Colored Silkies, Buff and White Frizzles and Rumpless Bantams. Eggs from all of these pens will be sold in lots at prices as follows: 100 eggs, $20; 60 eggs, $12; 30 eggs, $6; 15 eggs, $3. These lots of eggs will be packed all varieties mixed, just as they are gathered, each egg being marked with name of variety and date. No special selection will be made, and I assume no responsibility for infertility or loss in transportation. But I will have every care used in packing to insure safe delivery, and I am happy to say that at this date, June 15, my Bantam Eggs are remarkably fertile and are producing a high percentage of vigorous chicks. This is the greatest offer in bantams ever made in this country when the high quality of the birds is considered. Nearly every bird in these pens is a winner at the Crystal Palace or other great shows of England, and has been imported direct from Europe by myself. I received 800 from abroad during the months of January and February at a cost of from $5 to $50 each, and challenge any other yard in America to show their equal in high-class quality. I am rearing 2,000 of these birds myself, which will be offered for sale about September 15, at from $5 to $25 per pair. This offer is for the month of July only, as I shall break up my breeding pens about August 1st, to prepare the birds for the fall shows. Orders will be filled in regular rotation as they are received, therefore send them in early, as all orders not filled by August 1 will be returned. I recommend the 100 egg lot in preference to smaller ones, as in this large number the purchaser will probably get enough of each of the best varieties to insure getting a pair or trio. Remember that all of these are high-class, and that there are no scrubs or cheap birds in any of the pens. Faverolles eggs in July will be sold at $4 for 15, from the best pens of English Salmon and Erminie Faverolles. Pens 2 to 6 English Salmon and Ermine Faverolles, $2 for 15 eggs. Lakenvelder eggs, $6 for 15 eggs. Dr. A. H. Phelps, Glens Falls, N.Y. 64-66

GEYER'S SCURVY CURE FOR POULTRY was the first article introduced to the public for this purpose, which has been thoroughly tested in the last ten years by many of our brother fanciers who are willing to say with us that there is no other article on the market like this that can be relied on to do its work properly. It is something that the poultry fancier, who appreciates his fine birds, needs very much. What looks more disgraceful than a fine flock of chickens, many, or all of them, having their legs coated with a thick, hard, scabby crust which is called scurvy? It spoils the appearance of the birds and is very annoying to them. It is also contagious. Here we have a sure cure for this ugly disease. By following the directions we guarantee that it will take off that ugly, hard coat and leave the legs clean and smooth and give them their natural color. It also has no equal for healing sores and frosted combs and wattels. It makes them very bright and red. It is just what the exhibitor wants to prepare his birds for the exhibition room. Some of our customers tell us that they have tried it with good results for weak legs. We only ask you to give it a trial. It is put up in tin boxes. Money must accompany all orders. Price, 25 cents. Address, G. A. Geyer, Florin, Pa. 560tf

WHITE WYANDOTTES.

Proper Training, Conditioning and Shipping of Birds to the Shows to Secure Best Results.

By W. R. Graves.

I presume that the most, if not all, of the readers of this article intend to make an exhibit at some show in the near future, and I hope that what I may have to say will be of some help to some of them.

In my showing at the largest shows in the country, where I have held my own with the best that could be bred, bought or borrowed, and sometimes getting considerably the best of it, I attribute my success in a measure to the condition that I was able to get my birds in before shipping to the shows. The first requisite to success is to have good birds. The second is to have them well trained and conditioned,and then you will have to leave the rest to the judge. It is well to look over your birds two or three months in advance of the exhibition and see what birds show the most promise of making suitable show birds. If you have a cock and hen that in your estimation are about right, that are not entirely over their moult, get them by themselves, and if they are not in real good flesh feed them quite liberally. Give a small handful of sunflower seed to each bird every other day. If you feed a mash, mix in a small amount of Pratt's Poultry Food, which I find is excellent to promote a rapid growth of feathers. Look out for the last two or three flight feathers. A great many times they will moult out the other feathers and hold them until later. If they don't drop out with the others, pull them out and give the new ones a chance to come. If you feed them liberally and judiciously you will be able to carry a hen through her moult and have her in prime show condition in eight weeks' time, but you cannot do it without some extra care and attention. Now, watch out for your cockerels and pullets. There may be some one bird that is not so well developed as the flock they are with that has the making of the best bird in the bunch if given a show by itself. When you are satisfied that you have such a bird in your flock, give it all the show possible and see if the bird does not show a great improvement. If your birds are inclined to be wild, don't go chasing them all over the yard in the daytime, trying to catch them to give them their first lesson in training, but take them in the evening after they have gone to roost, handle them as carefully as possible, take them where there is a good light and give them some choice tidbit to eat, and in one or two handlings they will begin to look for your coming and lose their timidness. The more you can tame them in this manner the easier will be your work when it comes to training them to show their best position in the show coop. About two weeks before the show opens, it is advisable to commence in earnest to get your birds perfectly familiar with a show coop, and also to be used to people passing back and forth before the coop. Begin by putting the bird in the coop a short time and feed it scraps of meat or bread. Get it to eat out of your hand as soon as possible, holding it in such a position that the bird will hold its head up and stand in a natural position. If your birds are not of the "wild as hawk" kind a few times in the training coop will get them familiar with you, and they will be up and looking for you as soon as they hear your footsteps. It is well to get the birds used to looking for something choice when you come to the coop, then when the judge comes along they will be up and ready to show off to the best advantage. The first impression that the judge gets of a bird is what goes a long ways towards deciding the bird's fate. When you get your bird used to standing in a good position in the coop, you want to take it out and handle it so that they will be quiet in the judge's hands. To take a bird out of the coop with the least trouble and fluttering of the bird, pass your left hand under the breast, slipping the fingers around the thighs and throwing the legs out behind, then, with the right hand over the wings to prevent thrashing them around and breaking the feathers, you can draw him through the door without any trouble. It is very foolish to grab them by the wing or the neck, as I have seen some do, and then expect they are going to be quiet and do nothing. A bird that is thoroughly tamed will, when returned to the coop, show a fullness of feathers that helps a great deal towards making a perfect symmetry or typical carriage, while a bird that is very much frightened will draw its feathers up close and show a difference of from one to three points in the score. After a bird is properly trained, if it is a white bird or one that has considerable white, it is necessary to give the birds a thorough washing, which is the most difficult part and will try the patience of the most enthusiastic poultry crank. It is generally understood that only white birds are washed, but I have seen Barred Rocks that have been through the wash. The essential things to make a success of the job are a room where you can get the temperature up to 90 and keep it there, and a good supply of soft water. You will require three tubs for water. One to put your hot water in one for luke-warm water, and the other for cold water for the last rinsing. Take the best quality of Castile soap, cut it up fine, pour boiling water on it, and make strong suds. If you have a wife that is an expert at getting clothes very white, so much the better. Get her interested so she will take hold and do the washing, and I will guarantee you will have a good job done when you get through. Take hold of the bird's legs with the left hand and with the right under the bird's breast hold it over the tub, and let your helper wet the bird down with a sponge. Then take the sponge and dip it in the soapsuds and thoroughly sponge all over the feathers on the neck, back, wings and tail. Rub as hard as you are a mind to, for as long as you rub the way the feathers run you cannot hurt them. After getting them well soaped, wash the soap off with hot water, and if you see any feathers that look grimy you will have to give them more soap and harder rubbing. Now, with a quick motion, turn the bird over on its back, keeping your hand under the wings. Possibly the bird may be quicker than you are and with a quick flap of the wings give you a good dose of soapy water in the eye, but never mind, keep your temper and think of the blue ribbon you expect the bird will win. Go over the bird the same way on the under side. You will find this to be the hardest part, for they are usually pretty badly stained on the breast and thighs. When you have the bird well washed, take it to the tub of lukewarm water and have enough water in it to cover the bird all over except the head. Keep a firm hold of the legs, spread the wings well out and work up and down through the water to get the soap all out. Be sure and rinse the soap out thoroughly around the oil sack, for that is where the feathers will curl if there is any soap left. Take the bird to the third tub of cold water. A little blueing in the water will be a benefit, but be careful and not get too much or your bird will be a pretty sight when dry. Give the bird a good rinsing in this water. By this time the bird will be getting black in the face, but don't be alarmed. As a preventive of catching cold, I take a crumb of bread, put on five or six drops of Wilson's Neurophathic Drops and push it down the bird's throat. Take a fine brush and brush off all the water you can from the feathers. If you are good at playing ball, toss the bird up in the air and catch it when coming down. The bird will flap its wings and throw out a great deal of water. Now, have a good-sized coop with a clean roost in it and plenty of clean shavings or sawdust on the bottom and put is near enough to the fire so it will be about 95 degrees in it, and deposit the bird on the roost and give it a chance to dry. You may think your bird has seen its last days, but in a few hours it will brighten up and feathers will dry off from the head down. It will take ten to twelve hours to get all dried off and feathers fluffy. You will feel well repaid for your trouble when you see what an improvement is makes in the bird's appearance. You will find that washing the bird helps a great deal in taming it. Now, look your bird over thoroughly to see if you can find any black specks in the plumage. The best of them are liable to have them. If they are the small body feathers, pick them out and imagine the bird never had any. Don't wait until you get the birds to the show and then try to get them out just before they are judged, for it would make a bad impression on those who happened to see you. One of the things that is most neglected in fixing up birds for the show is the shanks and toes. Take a toothpick and run under each scale and clean the dirt out, same as you would your finger nails. It will come out easy after the bird has been washed. Then use a very little vaseline, rubbing well over the scales and wiping off clean so as not to soil the feathers. Polish the scales with a flannel cloth and you will be surprised what an improvement it will make in the looks of them If your birds have rough, scaly legs you should take them several weeks before the show, make a strong suds of Castile soap and hold the bird's legs in it until they have been well soaked, then wipe them off and apply an ointment, such as Lambert or Harding make for that purpose. Two or three applications will make a great difference in the looks of the scales. Another ointment that is good is to take sweet oil, sulphur, and a few drops of kerosene, mix together so as to make a thin paste and rub over the shanks and toes. Before sending the birds to the show, read the rules carefully in the premium list of the show you intend sending them to and follow instructions as laid out by them. Have your coops large enough so that the birds can stand up and turn around without bending the tail feathers all out of shape. Do not make a large coop and put an exhibition pen, one or two pullets, or hens, all in it, and expect they will be put in their proper classes when they are uncooped at the show, even if they are banded. Your birds will be cleaner and in nicer condition if you have them in individual coops and are much easier to handle. Attend the exhibition, and if it is a score-card show and you do not get the highest score, study the score card of the bird that did win, and by comparing it with yours see where your bird fails, and try another year to mate with birds that are strong in those points, not sacrificing the good points you already have, and the next season you may have the pleasure of owning the highest scoring bird.—National White Wyandotte Catalogue.

BUFF WYANDOTTE COCK "COSSAYUNA"

BRAHMAS, COCHINS, LANGSHANS.

At Last Have a Book "All to Themselves, and It Is the Best Yet.

Our readers who year after year have stood by these truly thoroughbred fowls, the Brahmas, Cochins and Langshans, will be delighted to know that at last there has been published a book worthy of these old-time standard fowls, a book that has no room for other breeds, but takes in all varieties of the breeds named. It is the book we have been waiting for, anxious to place it early in the hands of those of our readers who maintain that there are none to compare with the good old substantial, feather-legged Asiatics—progenitors of the best there is in poultrydom to-day.

This new book, "The Asiatics," gives Full Details of Their Origin; Peculiarities of Shape and Color; Egg Production and Market Qualities. It treats extensively on Breeding and Mating for Best Results, and goes deeply into the subject of Exhibiting,in addition to giving Detailed Illustrated Instructions on Judging. It is a Standard in itself, and is contributed to by leading breeders, exhibitors, and judges who have made their names famous through their experience.

To say that it is fully ilustrated conveys but a slight idea of its pictorial contents. It contains two full page color plates, each worth the price of the complete book, and fourteen full page Illustrations by Franklane L.Sewell, America's leading poultry artist, also over fifty additional drawings and photographs of specimen feathers and winning birds at the leading shows. The cover is in three colors.

The wealth of reading matter in its ninety-six pages cannot be given here. Suffice it is to say that the contents cover the subject, and that the regular price of the book (50 cents, postpaid) is many times represented in a single article. The value of the book is far greater than its price.

(This book will be sent free to anyone sending us one dollar for a yearly subscription to The American Fancier.) Address: American Fancier, Johnstown, N. Y.

CORRECTION.

Editor American Fancier:

In last issue of your valuable paper, a mistake was made in the Celeron Show report. I won 2d, 3d cocks, 1st and 2d hens, Rose Comb Brown Leghorns, but was credited with winning on Single Combs. They were not my best birds, but, nevertheless, would be pleased to have the mistake corrected. —H. S. Lamson, Banner Poultry Yds., Cameron, N. Y.

AN ORPINGTON PILLAR GONE.

MR. WILLIAM COOK.

It was with feelings of the deepest regret that I heard of the death of Mr. William Cook, of Orpington House, St. Mary Cray, Kent, and I feel sure all my readers will join with me in extending to the bereaved family their sincerest sympathy in this bitter hour of their life. The name is well known through the Fancy, and many will be the expressions of regret that his face will be no more seen. Always the picture of health, a bright, beaming countenance, full of kindliness and good nature, he carried about with him a passport into the heart of every one with whom he came in contact. His most affable disposition and genial, courteous manner always won over to him the confidence of all those who had any connection with him, and now to look back and think that he has gone from our midst, whence no man can return, and on which road we are all so speedily traveling.

Mr. Cook has done a great deal of traveling lately, so as to touch the Fancy in all parts of the world, and in America his name is respected as much as it is in England. It is not long since he took over the editorship of the "Orpington Poultry Journal," a a paper which combines both the Poultry Journal of England and "The Orpington" of America. The Orpington, as a fowl, has found favor with the American fancier, and this may be accounted for by the fact that Mr. Cook has visited the States on several occasions and shown them what the Orpington is like. He had just returned from an American tour with his eldest son, W. H., and was able to pay a visit to the Royal Show on the Wednesday, and attend the meeting of the Orpington Club. On that occasion I had the pleasure of a handshake, and it is all the more memorable, because it will be the last. From the show, he went down to Skegness for the benefit of his health, and here he succumbed to heart disease. It is not generally known outside the family circle that since the death of Mrs. Cook he has not been the same. Without a doubt the sudden shock was a great strain upon his constitution, and he never seemed to be able to wholly recover. Between the two there was always a perfect understanding, and they lived like two doves in their cote. With the accident to Mrs. Cook, which cost her her life, it can readily be seen that the bond of union which had lasted so long, and had been so happy, was broken, and the parting caused almost a breakdown on the part of him who has now gone the way of all flesh.

The question is often asked, "Can poultry-keeping be made to pay?" and Mr. Cook was a living exposition of the affirmative side of the question. Starting in a very small way, and with utility birds, Mr. Cook found there was money in poultry if managed the right way, and he at once set to work to probe the mystery of making a profit on the keeping of fowls. As time went on further knowledge was gained, and every opportunity was taken to improve the stock, with the result that to-day a stud has been worked up second to none in the country. Many times have I heard Mr. Cook speak of his early successes and how he has had to "buckle too" to keep pace with the work that he took in hand. Immediately any novice has doubted the money to be made out of poultry farming, Mr. Cook has drawn attention to his own efforts and life among the Fancy, and used himself as an example for others to follow. The present position has been reached by personal application, and a strong determination, coupled with attention to all the small details as they arise.

What do we find as the outcome? At St. Mary Cray there is a farm fitted up with all the most approved methods, stocked with birds, the finest that can be procured, and a system worthy of the great mind that controlled. When Orpington House was first secured it resembled nothing better than a tumbled-down house with surroundings as rough as can be imagined. To-day it is one of the neatest, nicest, and most comfortable places that could be met with. This transformation has been made under the direction of the late owner, and only shows what a great mind he had for the beautiful. The confidence, freedom of thought and action which he himself possessed has been handed down to the whole of the family, and there are few households that have such perfect understanding between one and another.

Not only has the St. Mary Cray establishment been increased, but farms have also been started out in South Africa and New Jersey, U. S. A. In these ventures he has been greatly assisted by his sons, but still there has been the controlling spirit of the head, and everything has turned out well. These are only instances of the enterprise that dominated Mr. Cook's career. All the changes and extensions have been taken up in the same way, with invariable success.

Now the great moving force has gone, his place is empty, and it remains for those left behind to move the machine and keep it going in the same grooves. As a fancier, his face was well known at all the leading shows, and will be sadly missed by all the regular attendants. His prowess in the pen need not be referred to here, it is so well known; his association with all the leading specialist clubs that touched his varieties, and his long continued support of the Fancy generally will be remembered by all fanciers. A great fancier has gone, the moving spirit will be seen no more, and we shall all miss him beyond what we can adequately estimate. To the family the great fountain has been broken, but the streams of goodwill, sincerity, and truth have run deep, so that the drinking of the past must help to quench the thirst of the future. Wherever the name of the Orpington is known it will be spoken of with reverence, because of the originator who has gone to join the great majority.

The funeral took place yesterday, at St. Mary Cray, a note of which we will give next week.—C. W., in Fanciers' Gazette, England.

Editor American Fancier:

I see in your paper of June 25 the article on score card judging, by Mr. H. H. Fike, in which he says it is only a question of time when the score card will be a thing of the past. This is where I beg to differ with him, just as judges differ on fowls in comparison. Who ever saw a poultry show judged by comparison that some one did not call down the judge on his decision? How often do we read in reports of our largest shows by the editors of poultry papers, that the third prize bird should have been first, and the second prize bird not fit to win a place and so on; and this goes to show that judging by comparison is not the real IT. And how about our amateur breeders who want to purchase a bird? Why, the first thing they ask is: How much does he score? and by whom was he scored? I do not believe a bird will score the same every day or under all judges, as conditions have much to do with the score. One may be made in a poor light, another by a man with poor eyesight, one judge may be a crank on cutting for creamy color in all white birds, and the other on some other section, etc. And the score card gets the blame for all this, and not the judge, where it belongs. In judging by comparison, the exhibitor has nothing to show that his birds were at the show, and why he won, or why he lost. He does not know whether the judge gave his bird a pleasant look or not, (unless he was at the show.) In a show judged by score card, the exhibitor knows what the judge thought of his birds on the day he scored it, whether he won or lost, and this is a great satisfaction to most all exhibitors, and I have seen exhibitors that would nearly fight for their cards. Your correspondent speaks of a pullet getting a high score, and she should have been cut 10 points on shape, and the score card gets the blame for all this (and not the judge.) How does he know she is out 10 points on shape? Is he a judge by comparison and afraid to put his opinion on paper? I think too many of the comparison advocates put all the blame of poor judging on the scorecard, instead of on the judge where it belongs. A man judging by comparison should not be afraid to put his judgment down in black and white, if asked to, and a good specimen should win under either system of judging. If all men could read and see alike then you might get a system by which we could all judge alike. You know that one will read the standard and get a different opinion from some one else, and so on, and people read the Holy Bible, and look at the different religions we have in this country. I do not think the score card is as near gone as your correspondent may think. If he will look over your list of coming poultry exhibitions he will find eight out of ten are score card shows, and could not exist if they were comparison shows. Their exhibitors want and demand a judge to put his opinion of their birds on paper, so they may know what he thinks is wrong with them, so they may correct the fault the next year. Comparison judging may be all right for our largest shows, where the entries run up to 2,000 head and the work must be done in one day, and I even doubt this, as many large shows are judged by both systems.

DUBBING GAME BANTAMS.

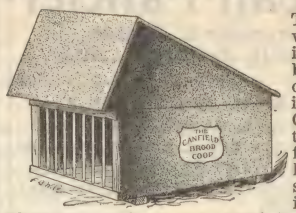
By an Old Dubber.

To the unitiated this necessary operation of dubbing Game Bantams is a most formidable thing, when undertaken for the first time. We need here hardly enter into the absolute necessity for it. To the really genuine Game man no bird with a comb on of the male sex has any great attraction. He has, perhaps, for years had a certain ideal in his mind, and that ideal is not of a bird with a comb on; in fact, it is a sine qua non that its comb shall not be on, and so long as he cannot be allowed to cut it off the bird has no manner of interest to him. It is not a Game bird in his estimation. But there are two considerations to all breeders of Game Bantams which render it almost imperative that the cocks should be dubbed.

First, there is the fighting proclivity, and this is no mean trifle. It causes no great harm, so long as the birds are without spurs, but it means much when these weapons are fully developed. And in these days of really expensive birds one cannot afford to have the front of one of our best birds torn ruthlessly out, all in a flash, by the lightning stroke of a spur, whilst the bird tenaciously holds to his antagonist by the comb or wattles. The amount of strength he can put in such a blow is enormous, and would be instantly fatal to the bird which allowed its antagonist to have the first lead in. Then again there is another consideration. Nowadays Game Bantams are required so exceedingly small that there is a great danger of non-fertility. As it is, there are many pullets which never lay an egg, and many cockerels which, as eighteen months old birds, never get a chicken.

It is a well-established fact that in any male bird, when the head is released from the comb it tends to fertility, and the operation is by no means the very cruel affair it is generally made out to be. The parts cut off are by no means of extreme sensitiveness, being more or less of a gristly horny type, and I think never showing any signs of bleeding after they are removed. Of course, the parts from which they are removed will bleed a little. Moreover, so little is the bird disturbed by the operation that very frequently he will, if allowed to, pick up the bit of himself and commence auto-cannibalism forthwith. Of course, there is the moment of severance; but that is of extremely short duration, and we think what pain there may be is mostly confined to it. The removal of the wattles will give less pain than that of the comb, from the fact that they are of less substance. Undoubtedly the thickest part of the root of the comb is the crucial part.

Well now, let us begin operations. We want a bowl of chilled water, a small piece of sponge, our dubbing scissors, and a little lard or vaseline. One word about the dubbing scissors. They should have curved blades; of course, good work can be done with straight bladded scissors, but better work if the blades be curved. They should be small. A pair about six inches long altogether, strongly built with blades as wide as ordinary buttonhole or nail-scissors, will be best. But it would be well to be provided with a very much finer pair for doing neat work at the side of the mandible. Very slender fine bladed, curved scissors are made, and can generally be procured at fishing tackle shops.



Well, if we are ready (for there should be two of us, one to hold the bird with one hand and the feet with another), we may begin upon the ears first, and if they be anything else than they ought to be, off they go before most operators are thinking about it. These bleed more than any other part, and the sponge and warm water may be used to wash the blood off. Next, take hold of one wattle, and pulling it just a wee bit straight, cut off close to the skin of neck. If you pull it more than straight, and cut off, you will find the throat pretty well half skinned, for the skin will open like a leg of mutton does to the inserted carving knife, and a great gash result. Trim the edges of skin well off after the wattle has been removed. Do the same now with the other wattle.

Now place the first finger of your left hand nail downwards into the mouth of the bird, and grasp the beak firmly between your thumb and finger. Open scissors to their widest, and get them pressed well down upon the head behind the comb. Now direct the blades of the scissors towards the beak, pressing evenly down upon the bird's head, and coming out level with one clean cut on the top of the beak. If all has been done skilfully, the operation will now be over, except for a little trimming of the edges of the wound. Rub a little vaseline over the freshly cut places, and put the bird in a pen. The scab will be ready for removal in a healthy bird, in nine days. —Fanciers' Gazette, England.

WISCONSIN'S BIG SHOW.

The Southeastern Wisconsin Poultry and Pet Stock Association will hold its seventh annual exhibition at Delavan, Wis., Jan. 23-28, 1905. Extensive preparations are already under way to make this show the best yet. Last year this association claimed the honor of being Wisconsin's best poultry show, and this claim was abundantly seconded by exhibitors and visitors alike. The rapid growth of the Delavan show is the best proof that it meets the demands of the fanciers. The surplus from last year's show is being utilized in providing additional show equipment. An active campaign is on to secure a most inviting list of cash specials, and silver cups will be offered in all leading classes in addition to those already put up by the association. The association has fresh from the press an edition of five thousand fall announcements, a copy of which will prove of interest to all fanciers and will be mailed free to everyone sending an inquiry to W. E. Peffer, Sec., Delavan, Wis.

SATURDAY, JULY 16, 1904.

The illustration on our title page represents a line of blood that has its marks in the evolution of the Buff Wyandotte. We remember this bird well, having handled him as a cockerel at the Johnstown show in 1899. He was bred by Andrew Ridell of Piser & Ridell, Shushan, N. Y., and sold by him to W. C. Pierce, the latter winning with him at the Indianpolis show in 1900. "Old Cossayuna" has been a famous winner in his day, and his blood is virtually the foundation of the Piser & Ridell strain of Buff Wyandottes.

Clement and Fike of Bridgewater Poultry Farm, Libertyville, Ill., have about as good White Wyandottes as are bred in the West, and their birds will compare favorably with the best in the East. This we know from personal handling of the birds. That is why we can endorse their circular letter to White Wyandotte fanciers, albeit very strong in its statements as to the merits of the birds, but aside from this, frank, determined and free from any attempt to mislead the public regarding the records of their birds at the shows.

The Canadian Government duplicates in the "coin of the realm" all the prizes won by Canadian live stock exhibitors at the World's Fair, St. Louis. This means some juicy picking of financial plums by poultry exhibitors in the Butterfield Empire of America. We can see thus early, the "smile that never eradicates" on "Kaiser Wilhelm" McNeil's face, contemplating the avalanche of shekels that will travel "Londonward." Then there is the "good and only Dick" Oke, another gatherer of hard cash earned by birds of fine feather. Why, Richard will have to engage "Billy" Barber and "Perennial" Daniels to keep watch of the gold he carries away from the town of Saints. By reading the official announcement of what the Dominion of Canada and some of the states in the Union have done for the livestock exhibitors at St. Louis, which appears in this issue, the reasons for the great advancement made in breeding thoroughbred stock in Canada are obvious. The incentive and pride to excel overtop all commercial motives. Nuff ced.

This reminds us of the prize list of the Canadian National Exhibition, just received. It is a neat, compact business-like book that tells eloquently what the great Toronto Fair is intended to be. It is not only the intention that attracts, but it is the feeling that it will be carried out to the letter. Having attended Toronto fairs in the past we have no hesitation in stating that they are the greatest in real educational value held in America.

Space forbids going into details regarding the great exhibits of horses, cattle, sheep, swine and dogs, but a few words regarding poultry and pigeons will not come amiss. The latter are classified, handled and judged the same as at the best conducted winter shows of the United States. In the matter of promptness in judging and placing the cards up, Toronto is streets ahead of many of our big shows. In Canada, it seems the public and visitors have some rights.

Exhibitors in the United States should make it a point to show at Toronto, if only a few birds. Those that have exhibited there have been well satisfied and reaped ample financial reward in the sale of stock. Canadian fanciers are good buyers of good stock. We would like to see a strong representation of United States birds at the great Canadian exhibition in September, and trust the spirit of the fancy will move some of our exhibitors to reciprocate the gameness and courtesy of Canadian exhibitors in sending birds to our leading shows. Dr. A. W. Bell of Toronto, Canada, will be glad to send premium lists to intending exhibitors. The dates are September 3 to 9.

The sudden death of Mr. William Cook, at his home in England, on June 24, removes from the fancy of the entire world a most powerful factor in building up a great trade in thoroughbred fowls on both continents. But it will be as the originator of the Orpington fowl that Mr. Cook will be known in the annals of the poultry fancy and his name securely established as the champion of a most meritorious and popular variety of the feathered race. Mr. Cook, on his two visits to America, made many friends by his pleasant and cheerful manner, and this, coupled with shrewd business tact, started the Orpington on a new wave of popularity. We reprint from the current issue of the Fanciers' Gazette, England, the particulars regarding the life and death of Mr. William Cook.

The new book, "The Asiatics," published by the Reliable Poultry Journal Publishing Co., is devoted to Brahmas, Cochins and Langshans, and makes a most valuable contribution to the poultry literature of the day. The book is handsomely illustrated by Sewell and is worth more than the price asked for it—fifty cents. We will send it free to any person sending us one dollar for one year's subscription to The American Fancier.

The statement that birds have been passed as having absolutely perfect plumage, as far as the color is concerned, should be taken cum grano salis. We have never seen an absolutely perfect bird in this respect, when the most thorough test was applied. There are grand specimens that look, but are not absolutely perfect in color. And there will never be one, at least not until the millenium arrives, when all men and women will talk, see and think alike.

The following letter from a prominent fancier in Belfast, Ireland, will prove of interest to readers of The American Fancier, and to Langshan fanciers in particular:

31 College Gardens,
Belfast, Ireland.
June 27, 1904.

Editor American Fancier:

Sir,—Will you kindly excuse me trespassing on your time; but a friend having sent me a copy of your issue of June 11, I cannot help expressing my satisfaction with your remarks concerning the "Langshan" caricature in Poultry of May 27.

My knowledge of the Langshan arose from my working out through Mr. Cook's acknowledgments, that it formed a part of his pure (?) bred Orpingtons; no one told me anything on the matter, my trying the Langshan was a pure evolution of my own choice. I found there was no breed equal to it, so consequently I am anxious to add a mite of testimony to its merits. It is to me a most extraordinary exhibition of obstinacy and ignorance to palm such a giraffe off as a prize-worthy Langshan. Those doing so cannot, I should say, distinguish between a flamingo and a hen.

I hope that in America you may have the reward you deserve for your clear-sighted appreciation of the unadulterated Croad Laugshan, and may you ever keep the type clean. I remain,

Yours very truly,
S. S.

The Standard for Langshans is fixed and inflexible in America. When the illustrations appear in the new Standard, our esteemed correspondent will note that the Croad type still prevails as it did ten or fifteen years ago. We also call attention to another letter from Miss Croad, that appears on another page of this issue. It adds to Langshan history and is a valuable and timely contribution.

Unless something definite is soon forthcoming from the Costly Fishing Club president and secretary in regard to the summer outing in the Adirondacks, it will prove not only costly, but expensive to them. All the members are at the starting post waiting to hear the starting gun and there will be another Andrew Johnson case on our hands unless those worthy personages wake up and hear the orioles warbling. There comes a time in the life of exeryone when it is necessary to either fish, cut bait or go ashore, and it seems that the first mentioned is the crying need of the present, and we would particularly direct their attention to the laws of the state of New Jersey, under which our club is incorporated, which state emphatically that every fishing club must go through the motions once a year whether fish are caught or not.

The above paragraph is not exactly and truly ours. But we father it because the sentiment expressed is a cog-like thinkereena that works machine like in the coggy or foggy brain motors of numerous members of the Costly Fishing Club, including the smelt, pompano, eel, sucker, and the bait fish. When the shark and the devil-fish are heard from there will be a hot time at the next annual banquet.

For the benefit of show secretaries and others we will state that Orpingtons are distinctly an English variety of fowl and should be classed as such in all premium lists. The mistake in placing Buff Orpingtons in the American class in the old Standard of Perfection was purely an oversight; one that either Deacon Thomas Evangelist Orr will be glad to be responsible for, or blame it on that convenient scapegoat—the printer. In the new standard, the Orpington will be classified under English breeds.

TORONTO EXHIBITION PRIZE LIST

The prize list put up by the Canadian National Exhibition of Toronto, to be held this year from August 29 to September 10, is an especially good-looking production. It provides for the distribution of thirty-five thousand dollars in premiums and prizes, of which nigh unto twenty-seven thousand dollars is given for horses, cattle, sheep, swine, poultry and dogs. All the buildings will be crowded with samples of the industries and resources of the country In addition, some thirty thousand dollars will be devoted to the securing of special attractions, which will include the appearance every morning, afternoon and evening on the grounds of the famous Black Watch Band, a production of the greatest spectacle with fireworks yet attempted, entitled "The Siege of Lucknow," and naval exercises, in which torpedoes and armor-piercing shells will be used.

THE LANGSHAN FOWL AND ITS EGGS.

Editor American Fancier:

You may be sure I have read with great satisfaction your able and just remarks on the ruthless way in which a section of the English "Fancy" has for many years been using the name of that handsome and useful bird, the Langshan, for a typeless mongrel, which, as you truly say, might be truly termed "a blooming caricature." I send you the illustration of one of these "caricatures" that appeared in a local Sussex paper on the 11th of this month (June), and you will see by the letter press that accompanies it that there seems a desire to identify me with this lanky composition. From the first I have found it advisable to avoid mating with birds from other yards, even when they professed to be of my own strain. You see I have always restricted myself to single combed Black Langshans—this mainly to simplify the supervision of my birds. The Langshan stamps itself so indelibly on a cross that novices might perhaps be excused for mistaking the cross for the put, for as Mr. Gedney pointed out years ago, "In the whole race of domestic poultry there never never was a pure breed which lent itself so readily to the hands of the manufacturer of mongrels as the Langshan."

About the brown eggs and the white, any device used to deceive, that is, to make a thing appear what it is not, must surely be a fraud. Margarine is sold as a substitute for butter, but woe betide the man who tries to pass it off as the genuine dairy produce. About tinting the egg in order to please the eye of the consumer, if both tender and consumer are privy to the fact, there is no more to the said; although it scarcely seems fair to the breeds on whom nature bestowed this pretty gift for the adornment of our breakfast tables that it should be usurped by a "make believe" and a "sham," and it is so easy to get a tinted egg without resort to such practices. In the cross between the Langshan cockerel and the Dorking hen in the first crop the egg was of course white, but the second crop gave us a handsome tinted egg. We never went beyond this second crop, which would but have led to complication. Some of my practical correspondents (I mean those whose vocation is high class cookery) have told me they consider the Langshan egg a very valuable help and they have particularly mentioned the white as lending itself more readily to the "snows" and light ornamentation of their calling. The white of the Langshan egg has always reminded me of that of the Plooer.

I remember once discussing the "size," "weight" and "value" of eggs in general with my staunch friend, that eminent naturalist, Mr. Harrison Weir, and I had to confess that the Langshans laid a small egg compared with the size of the bird. "That may be," he replied, "but the egg is the future void in 'embryo.'" You may depend it is all there.

Mr. M. C. Gurney, British Consul General at Marseilles, who has kept Langshans for years, and is one of their most enthusiastic admirers, advises me that the size of Langshan eggs might be increased by selection, and we may perhaps also say by generous feeding.

May I be allowed to add to this letter one published for me in "Feathered Life," on the 11th inst. "Feathered Life" is a comparatively new journal that by the interesting matter is contains and the fairness in which it is conducted seems to be making its way to success by leaps and bounds.

A. C. CROAD,
Bedford, England.

The letter referred to by Miss Croad is as follows:

THE WHITE EGG AND THE BROWN.

(To the Editor of Feathered Life.)

Sir:—I have followed the discussion on the "white egg and the brown egg" with much interest, and have been wanting to see "the end thereof." Just before the arrival of our first Langshans a friend presented me with a pen of silver-grey Dorkings. They were very fine birds, but as we seemed to be the sole possessors of the pure Langshan at that time, and were only amateurs, we sent the cock to a friend and kept the hens, but merely for cross purposes. All the eggs in this cross were white, and we thus learnt that the thoroughbred hen in the first cross colors her own egg, although the second cross will partake of the coloring of the eggs of the breed with which she has been mated. In 1882 (ten years later) the "Northern Agriculturist" gave the account of an experiment made by Mr. Lewis P. Muirhead, to decide some point regarding the crossing of strains. For this purpose, he used two La Fleche hens, with which the late Mr. Dring had won many prizes. The males were from eggs laid by hens imported from Langshan, North China, by the late Major Croad. In the first cross the hen was Hamburgh in type, with white ear-lobes, and laid a white egg. In the fifth cross the hen was a perfect Langshan, with her ear-lobes, and characteristic pink-buff egg.

In 1876, when the Langshan began to assert itself, there came a demand for birds and eggs, and our customers one and all spoke in the highest terms of the breed generally and of its laying powers in particular. M. V. la Perre de Roo in his "Monagraphic" "Poute-merveillence surtout eu hiver quant toutes nos poules se reposent." Your correspondent, Mr. Arthur Little, gives an accurate description of the egg in an article that appeared in Feathered Life on January 6th. The richness and flavor of an egg no doubt depend greatly on the feeding the birds get—for instance, tainted grain will impart its unpleasant flavor, and insufficient food must naturally take from its richness; but, apart from other considerations, the Langshan possesses qualities peculiar to itself. The white of the egg, as well as its flesh, is the whitest I have ever seen. The late Mr. G. Mander Attender, acting manager of the late Aylesbury Dairy Company, in 1887 sent us a copy of "Live Stock Journal" containing a letter descriptive of the poultry kept on the company's farm at Horsham (now people by Blue Coat boys). In this letter he gave the highest place as a generally useful fowl to the Langshan. He said they kept them in larger numbers because they found them on the whole more profitable than any other breed of fowls. He pointed out that, although the Langshan did not lay a large egg, it gave one that was very acceptable, its beautiful and varied tints rendering it an ornament to the breakfast table.

Had the Aylesbury Dairy Company been still in existence it might have given "fanciers" a lesson in selling tinted eggs without resorting to fraudulent practices. I am certain that eggs do vary in flavor, and to an invalid of delicate taste the dye would betray itself even if it were not poisonous.—A. C. Croad.

WORLD'S FAIR LIVE STOCK PRIZES.

The revised Live Stock Prize-List for the Universal Exposition at St. Louis, just issued, gives a remarkable summary of the vast aggregate of exposition and special cash prizes provided for the different shows of live stock. These make a total of nearly one-half million of dollars and provision for special prize awards still to be made will undoubtedly swell the amount to more than that sum. The exposition and special prizes by divisions as given in the prize list are as follows:

Breed.	Div.	Amount.	Special.	Total.
Horses	A	$94,300	$21,490.00	$115,790.00
Cattle	B	65,520	39,586.25	105,106.25
Sheep	C	44,390	5,720.00	50,110.00
Swine	D	30,311	16,995.00	47,306.00
Poultry, Pigeons and Pet Stock	E	15,582	6,499.00	22,081.00
Dogs and Cats	F	10,204	5,085.00	15,289.00
Southern Breeding Cattle	G	10,000	3,570.00	13,570.00
Carload Lots of Cattle	H	10,000	2,150.00	12,150.00
Exposition and Special Prizes		$280,308	$101,095.25	$381,402.25
State and Provincial Prizes, etc., not included above				57,300.00
Grand total				$438,702.25

The following prize and expense funds for live stock exhibits at the World's Fair have been provided by State Commissions:

Illinois	$ 15,000
Iowa	12,000
Kansas	10,000
Kentucky	7,500
Missouri	100,000
Nebraska	2,300
Oklahoma	500
Wisconsin	10,000

Indiana has made provision for the payment of freight on live stock exhibited from that state.

The Dominion of Canada will duplicate all exposition prizes won by provincial live stock exhibitors. This provision has been outlined in a letter to Colonel Mills, Chief of the Love Stock Department, from Hon. William Hutchison, Canadian Commissioner General, as follows:

> "The Canadian Government will give to all Canadian exhibitors of horses, cattle, sheep, swine and poultry winning prizes at the World's Fair, a sum equal to the amount given by the Exposition in prize money to each exhibitor."

Canadian exhibitors have evinced a decided interest in the live stock preparations for the Universal Exposition, and the showing made by the Canadian live stock interests at St. Louis this year will undoubtedly excel the admirable record made at the Columbian. At that time Canadian exhibitors excelled all state winnings with the single exception of Illinois and in a number of important classes carried away the lion's share of the awards. The assurance by the Canadian Exposition Commission that the winnings by Dominion breeders will be duplicated will greatly heighten the interest takn in the World's Fair Show by exhibitors from that country.

White Squabs, $2.50 to $2.75 per dozen.

It is an old saying that he who waits, will not wait in vain. When describing the method of dressing poultry for market, I wished to give a working illustration.

The Successful Poultry Journal for July has an article on Killing Poultry for Market, as practiced at an establishment at Adair,Ill., and described by a former manager, covering the ground mentioned in the request of mine for information on this subject,but no Fancier reader could or would give it:

"From the time the birds are received until they are speeding away to market, it is very necessary that they be properly handled to insure the best results. Immediately upon receiving the fowls, they are placed in the receiving or first "live room," where they are allowed plenty of water but no food, unless they are to be held until the following day. From here they are driven to the second "live room," where they await their turn to be driven up a chute into a small enclosure which is a box-like apartment holding about 75 chicks. They are shut in this apartment, which brings them within reaching distance from a small door which leads into the dressing room. From here they are taken by the killer in small bunches of eight or nine. They are hung in an enclosed trough and killed by inserting a knife of the French style through the mouth to the throat, leaving no outward sign of the cut. The killing,though seemingly a simple matter, requires much experience in order to do it properly. A poorly cut bird will raise its head and swallow the blood, which must then be cut from the crop after the fowl is dressed, and this mars its appearance. The scalding, which is the next operation, is without doubt the most important one in this department, as too much or not enough will cause the skin to either tear or rub off in picking, leaving the bird with a spotted appearance when ready to ship. The scalding is done by dipping the bird, never allowing the head or shanks to come in contact with the water. There is no fixed time for holding the bird in the water, and the operator must be governed mostly by the appearance of the wings, which is properly scalded will be drawn close to the body, and have a set appearance. Ducks and geese are handled in the same way, but owing to their short legs and the thickness of their plumage, they are much more difficult to handle. Turkeys are never scalded unless of a very poor quality. The scalder upon taking the bird from the kittle quickly shakes the water from it, roughs it by freeing it from the bulk of its feathers, and hands it to the picker to be finished. The picking or finishing is quite a small matter, for when properly scalded, the feathers come off very readily with a slight rub.

Attached to a beam leading quite across the picking room are wedge-like hooks into which the fowl's feet are thrust, holding the bird in a convenient position for finishing. After being thoroughly cleaned, it is thrown into a vat of ice water, where it remains until thoroughly cool, when it is removed and packed away in chipped ice to await shipping. The packing for shipment at this time is very expensive,owing to the great amount of ice used. The method is to first place a layer of chipped ice in the barrel, then a layer of birds and so on until the barrel is full. After being properly weighed, each package containing a separate grade of fowls or chicks is numbered and an invoice made of the entire shipment. Each barrel is capped with a rounded cake of ice about six inches thick. It is then covered with burlap fastened firmly down with the first hoop, and rolled out upon the loading platform to await the refrigerator car, which at this time should not be far from due."

It is a source of great pleasure to me to give the American Fancier readers the above able article, but I cannot endorse Editor Heck in what he says about the Fancy Poultry Breeder Versus the Market Poultry Raiser. It is no doubt true, the out and out fancier is the one that advertises, and it is also true the marketman has very little interest in poultry literature, the agricultural paper with its weekly report of the markets, being more in sympathy with his business, naturally gets his patronage.

This only covers the radical position of two classes of poultry keepers. There is a middle class greatly in the majority, as far as numbers go, who are both fanciers and marketmen combined. This class is supporting the poultry press handsomely and keeping alive the very fanciers referred to above. I speak of the fancier who combines fancy and utility, and makes the bulk of the market for the valuable breeding stock raised by the out and out fancier, and the only market he has whereby to get the dough to pay his advertising bills.

It is also true, as his correspondent says, the radical fancier cares nothing about how many eggs a year a hen can lay so long as she has the "golden beaks, bay eyes, good head points, fine under color, moderate fluff, spreading tail, etc., but to the class of poultry keepers I belong and referred to above as the middle class, and with whom I have labored since 1881, it makes a lot of difference. I expected my show bird to take her place in the breeding pen and produce layers; if she could not I did not want her, and the first "supporter" of poultry journals who came along with a twenty spot could have her and be hanged to her. A champion exhibition hen has as good a right to lay 200 eggs a year as a scrub, and will do it if the owner cares to work her with that end in view.

I wish to say before I go farther, the Successful for July is the only live copy of a monthly poultry journal I have seen in many moons, and I am under obligations to them for favoring me with it.

I will not pass along to the incident that suggested my remarks on this subject. I have just returned from a two days' visit to Ridgecrest Poultry Farm, at Warwick, N. Y., just such an establishment as I have been championing in this article. The proprietor, Mr. Minturn, is one of those unselfish poultrymen, always ready to help the beginner at a show who has the birds to win, though not the knowledge to place them, even if he lose an otherwise sure prize.

His popularity as Supt. of Poultry at the Orange County Fair has run the exhibit of 800 birds when he took hold, up to 2200 at the last show.

Since my return to pavements, work and excessive city heat, I have often thought of the chickens at Ridgecrest, each with its favorite shrub under which to escape the sun, looking so comfortable, and the refreshing breezes that blow across the lawn.

Although having large dairy and landed interests, the only surviving member of the old guard of Orange county fanciers takes great pride in his fowls.

Among the varieties I noticed the Silver, Golden, Buff, White and Partridge Wyandotte, Buff Leghorns, Rose Combed Whites and Browns, White Rocks, Light Brahmas and several varieties of Bantams, all as near perfection as possible to get them, but still expected to fill the egg basket and supply a chicken dinner.

It was with extreme reluctance I quitted so pleasant a spot, and a family who made me so welcome on this and many former occasions, but necessity knows not the laws of whims and fancies.

MINOR AILMENTS OF POULTRY.

There are endless causes of disease among poultry, chief among them being—

Careless breeding,
Damp,
Draughty houses,
Filth;

the last mentioned being by far the worst of all.

Careless feeding is another, and especially so when food is left lying about on the land to become contaminated by the droppings of unhealthy birds. The waste of food is costly—for it is but seldom that birds will eat stale food—but expense is the least part of the evil; the souring of the land, with its attendant train of disease and death, is the greater.

We are careful with our horses, our cattle, our sheep and our pigs; but poultry may die of the deadliest and most infectious diseases, and may be left lying about to spread disease germs wholesale, and no one seems to care a whit. The remedy is of the simplest. Isolate sick birds on the first appearance of any disorder, and burn all dead birds: the risk of infection is thus minimized at once.

Ill-ventilated, draughty houses, leading, as they do, to outbreaks of cholera, colds, consumption and other ailments, are a fruitful source of loss to the poultry yards of England. Seeing the immense number of uses to which eggs can be put, and the great facilities we have in our markets being at our very doors, poultry-keepers should take heed lest, by neglecting advice and opportunities, the industry be killed, so far as the home producer is concerned, by the more careful foreign business men with whom we poultry-keepers already have to deal.

In the first place, it must not be forgotten that the most successful breeders and fatteners never keep diseased birds about their yards, unless in the case of very valuable stock which will pay for the curing; it is generally cheaper and wiser to kill and burn the sick bird straight away; but if your birds be valuable ones, isolate and treat them according to the directions given in this article, and you will then probably cure about 70 per cent. of them.

To be sure of making a larger profit year by year, you should remember and observe the following rules:—

1. Never breed from birds which have been cured, apparently, of roup, dropsy, liver disease, or consumption;

2. Always be careful to give your stock plenty of clean, fresh water at least once a day, so that they need not drink any filthy stuff they may come across;

3. Be sure that your poultry houses are well built and thoroughly ventilated, but are not in the least degree draughty;

4. Be most careful to see that these houses are kept clean and sweet, and free from vermin of all kinds;

5. Breed only from those of your hens which lay best; weed out each year those which, either by reason of the small size of their eggs or from their inferior laying capacities, cannot be termed really profitable;

6. Remember that brains and energy, coupled with a careful attention to details, are more valuable than the practice of false economy, whether as regards money or time,

7. Above all else, remember that unless your birds have a proper supply of clean water and suitable foods they cannot lay eggs, however well they may have been bred for the purpose;

8. Do not forget that, as birds have no teeth, and in order that they may properly masticate their food, and so keep free from indigestion and liver disease, hard grit of some kind must be found for them. The cry, "My birds can get grit for themselves," is too often untrue; fowls are not quarrymen, and they cannot get more grit than is actually on the surface, while only certain sizes of this are of any real good.

Poultry-keeping is a national industry, not a mere hobby to be dabbled with in one's spare time, and to succeed it must receive that proper business attention which, as a great national asset it most certainly deserves.

In this article I am taking the lesser ailments seriatim, and those of my readers who will obtain leaflets Nos. 57, 58, 67 and 78, and the leaflet (25) issued by the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction for Ireland, will see the similarity of symptoms in the cases of cholera, diarrhoea, dysentery and liver complaint. The gist of the whole matter is that there should be no epidemic of any of the more deadly diseases if the first symptoms are carefully noted and the sick birds put away by themserves at once; while if the few rules given above be observed by all poultry breeders, big and little alike, and if dirty floors and food troughs and waste of food be tabooed, not only will there be no disease, but there will be very greatly increased profits, and it will be found that utility poultry-keeping, like dairying, can be made to pay, and to pay well.

In no case should the male birds be anything but pure bred; to attain the best results the hens should be pure bred, or, at any rate, only first crosses. Mongrels often lay well, but they may have the germs of disease lying dormant within them; and now that there are so many hundreds of persons breeding healthy, pure-bred birds solely for utility purposes, anyone can obtain eggs or chicks from reliable laying strains at but small cost.

Spices for fowls are but the same as condition powders for stock—exceeding useful as medicines, but more than deleterious when given every day. The spring of the year is the natural laying season of the fowl; no artificial aids are then required by the hen, and, if given, only tend to deplete the owner's pockets and to spoil the constitution of his birds. On the other hand, when moulting, fowls do require doctoring a little, and they need more and better food to make up for the animal energy expended in the making of the new feathers.

Apoplexy usually comes from overfeeding on starchy foods, and can but rarely be cured. If the bird is very valuable, proceed as follows:—Open the large vein under the wing and hold the bird's head under a cold water tap for a minute or two; then, if it shows signs of recovery, feed it sparingly for a few days on soft, light food—giving no hard grain at all—and a dose of five grain of bromide of potassium each day.

Do fowls bear purging? If so, calomel is a useful purge in apoplexy. Probably about 1/8th grain powder every day.

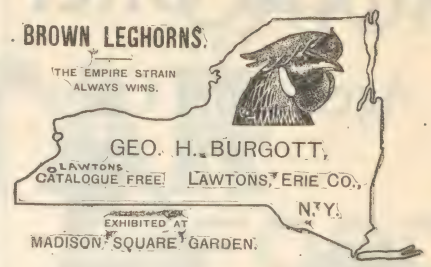
Reduce the amount of food given to the rest of pen, and be sure that all your birds have plenty of greenstuff and exercise.

Bronchitis, as a rule, comes in the cold, wet weather of autumn, but it sometimes causes trouble at other seasons if fowls be exposed to violent storms or are kept in ill-ventilated, dirty houses. It may be induced by the spreading about in yards or on floors of unslaked lime, for this irritates the bronchial tubes and lungs, and so makes the birds prone to take cold more readily than they should do.

If the disorder becomes apparent, be careful to pick out all suspects and house them separately, keeping them fairly warm, dry, and out of draughts, and give each sick bird one drop of tincture of aconite three times a day. It is but seldom they will need treating for more than four days.

Many of the reputed cases of "gapes" are really bronchitis, and whereas the treatment for the latter will not hurt birds suffering from gapes, that for gapes would be likely to kill those suffering from bronchitis. It is therefore wise first to treat for bronchitis all birds which seem ill and gape, and if at the end of three or four days they be not cured, then to proceed as for gapes. (Leaflet No. 58, Part 1).

Feed your patients while under treatment on a warm mash mixed crumbly, but by no means sloppily, composed of three parts scalded bran, one part of cooked lean meat, and one part each of oatmeal and boiled linseed meal, with plenty of green food and grit of some kind, but give no hard food until birds are well. The food must be given to each bird by hand.

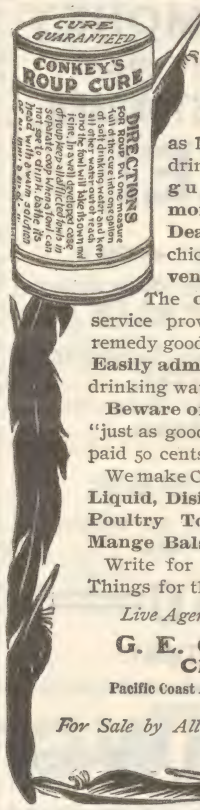


Fumigate the patients every night with a little eucalyptus oil on a hot shovel; this will make them cough, but will do them a great deal of good. It is also well, especially in obstinate cases, to place a bowl of boiling water in the hospital coop, into which has been poured from three to five drops of the eucalyptus oil. Both oil and water must be renewed three times a day.

Bumble-foot is caused by a variety of ways—by a bruise possibly from treading on a sharp stone; from a thorn or piece of glass; by jumping down from a high perch on to a hard floor; or even, perhaps, from the bird's blood being out of order, in which case it is rather hard to cure, as, besides poulticing and lancing the foot, some tonic must be given internally or blood poisoning may ensue.

Five-toed birds, such as Dorkings, Faverolles or Houdans, are peculiarly liable to this ailmen more especially when kept in stony runs.

In any case isolate the bird, and do not let it perch, but bed it down on bruised straw (which should be changed twice a day); poultice the injured foot as often as each application gets cold with bread or linseed, and when the foot is quite soft lance it lightly and squeeze out all matter, afterwards washing the wound thoroughly but tenderly with a weak solution of carbolic acid and water; next take a soft rag and dry the foot, and paint the wound with a solution of 10 grains nitrate of silver in 1 oz. of distilled water. Bind the foot up just so tightly as to bring the cut edges together, put in two stitches, and in a few days the bird should be well.



In every case of lameness catch the bird up, wash the foot quite clean, and examine it first before treating as here advised, for if there be no sign of a wound, and the bird be either very heavy or very light, it may be the mischief is caused by liver or kidney trouble, as this ofttimes shows first by a lameness in one leg, generally the left.

Colds are not likely to develop into roup, but as they may do so it is well to treat them promptly, when, as a rule, they are quite easily cured. Do not say, as some do, "There's a chicken ill, if any more go like that we shall have to do something." Whenever a bird is ill, and whatever is the matter, take it away from the others at once, for colds are often easily spread, and much mischief may be cause by delay.

A very good preventive of colds is to put a small piece of camphor in each drinking trough, only on no account must the water be allowed to dry up, or your camphor will evaporate and your labor be wasted; and to add a little ground ginger to the soft food. If, in spite of all your care, colds do come, then proceed as follows:—Rinse out the mouth of each sick bird with a solution of 25 grains sulphate of quinine to one fluid ounce of water. If, after a couple of days in a warm sunny house or coop, out of the reach of draughts, any birds be still unwell, fumigate them at night, as for severe bronchitis, and give each one from two to three pills, according to how ill they are, composed as follows:

Lard (fresh liquor), 1 tablespoonful.
Mustard, 2 tablespoonsful.
Ground ginger, 2 tablespoonsful.
Cayenne, 1 teaspoonful.

the whole stiffened with flour. These must be actually put down the patient's throat; and here it will be as well to say that in all cases of feeding a bird of any kind by hand the greatest care must be taken not to double up the tongue or the bird will be choked.

The proper way to feed a bird by hand is to proceed as follows:—Take the bird out of coop, tie its legs together, and place it under your left arm, holding it tight enough to prevent struggling; open the mouth with the first finger and thumb of left hand, holding the tongue down; put the spoon containing the medicine right into the bird's mouth and then, when medicine has been given, withdraw spoon, close bird's mouth, and keep it closed until dose has been swallowed.

Constipation can generally be very easily cured by giving the bird a dose of from 10 to 30 grains of Epsom salts in warm water on an empty stomach, and by feeding it chiefly on cut "green" bones (these must be absolutely fresh from the butcher), bran and cabbage; but in case of "stoppage," unless a competent veterinary surgeon can be called in at once, it is best and kindest to kill the bird promptly.

Consumption, to an ordinary person, seems much like liver disease, though there may be no connection between the two. Liver disorders come from impoverished stock and over-fattening food, whereas consumption, though sometimes coming from careless in-breeding, is generally to be traced to neglected colds or pneumonia.

Chickens hatched from anaemic stock are, moreover, prone to acquire the disease.

As there is no certain remedy known, and as the disease spreads rapidly, it will be found advisable to kill all birds so affected, and to burn the carcasses.

Cramp comes, like apoplexy, from overfeeding, or from too much fatty matter; from being kept on stone or concrete floors; and sometimes from imperfect circulation.

The feathers "stare," especially across the back, and, though the eye may be bright and the plumage glossy, the bird has no strength in its legs at all.

Soak the legs in hot mustard and water, and when quite warm rub dry, and then anoint them first with turpentine and afterwards with vaseline. Repeat the treatment in a few hours' time, and the bird will generally recover.

In order, however, that the symptoms may not recur, see that all your birds have plenty of exercise; throw down some small grain among their scratching litter, and give them a large-headed cabbage or mangold to pick, and let them have more fresh lean meat than before.

Leg weakness, which usually shows itself among over-forced young table poultry, may be treated precisely the same as cramp, but the treatment, to be truly efficacious, should be more thorough, for while the cure of cramp is only a matter of hours, if taken in time, leg weakness often cannot be stopped in less than a fortnight. Proceed as follows:—Put the affected birds quite away by themselves, and do not allow them to perch, but bed them down on peat moss, chaff, or bruised straw; feed them chiefly on pea or bean meal, sharps, bran, a good deal of lean meat or cut green bone, and greenstuff, giving them a tablespoonful of Douglas's mixture (the recipe for this will appear in the concluding portion of this article—Ed. "Poultry") to every quart of drinking water every other day for a month. On no account let the birds have any hard corn for a couple of weeks, but feed them up on the food already mentioned. That your birds may not receive a set-back of this sort, be careful not to feed over-much on such foods as maize or maize meal, rice or white bread.—C. E. J. Walkey. (In The Journal of the Board of Agriculture, vol. x., No. 4).

(To be concluded.)

TABASCO SAUCE.

Sir Henry Trafford has stepped up with his explanation.

It's all right, Hank. I never thought for a moment you meant a wrong.

As I am no mind reader, it rather jarred me when you said "Mr. Brown's name stood out boldly as a winner."

Taking things for granted, cost the American Poultry Ass'n $2,500, or thereabouts.

Don't "fall asleep at the switch," Henry. In other words, don't be a lobster.

Thus endeth this chapter.

Time, June 24. Place, Royal Poultry Show, England.

Enter Grant M. Curtis of America and editor of "Poultry," England.

Curtis gives his opinion of the different breeds. Dorking is no good, but thinks well of the old English and Cornish Indian Game.

Pray tell, what does Curtis know about these breeds?

Dr. Phelps, please listen.

The Sussex fowl did not meet with his approval.

And the Faverolles he classed as a mongrel.

How about it, Dr.? Say, Phelps, just drop a line to the American Fancier and make Curtis side-step.

And so on down the list, Curtis deals out bits of gold to our English friends.

Wonderful, the great knowledge one can acquire in a short space of time.

It is only a short time ago that Curtis did not know a Plymouth Rock from a stove.

Now, to the real point of my attack.

Editor of Poultry says: "We are told the new Standard being issued by the A. P. A. is the best thing that has been attempted. I say correct.

Now, listen!

"And the whole of the sketches have been done by Sewell.

Mr. Sewell is in the employ of Mr. Curtis.

Mr. Curtis is in Europe. After the interview the above sentence is published.

I repeat, "Mr. Sewell did all the sketching."

This is a large world, yet a chicken most always comes home to roost.

And now, Mr. Editor of Poultry, England, please do not give us any more of it, as I see you promise to do so.

I'll bet Curtis played to the galleries to beat the stars.

Sewell made all the cuts, eh? What about Schilling, Graham and Burgess? Thought they made a few.

Sewell is all right, but he is not the only kernel on the cob. Not by a long shot!

I do not think the editor of Poultry (England) would misrepresent.

I do not want to think that Curtis would deliberately lie.

But I must think that Curtis created a false opinion in what he did say regarding these cuts.

Friday, Oct.28, is to be Poultrymen's Day, "and accepted by the fanciers," so I am told..

I had an idea I was somewhat of a fancier, but it is all news to me.

I have not accepted anything, not even to judge at St. Louey.

"Accepted by the Fanciers" is good. Say, Mr. Supt. Orr, who are the fanciers that have accepted that day? And Friday at that!

Another Com. of 3, eh?

"Link" Orr, "Tom" McGrew and "Jack" Crothers' entertainment com. Well!

Wonder if these three ducks will have the gall to make out they are a committee of the Am. P. Ass'n.

I would like to ask Sec'y Orr if Steinmesch, McGrew and Fishel are really a committee of the A. P. A.

If they are, I'll shut up. If they are not, let them drop their handle.

"Minne" wins by 19 votes.

Say, Drev., cold weather does not prevent hot air in A. P. A. meetings. Have you forgotten so soon, Rochester?

Glad to see the Canadians have fallen into line again.

Dick Oke and Billy McNeil are two of the best fellows on earth and I am real glad, indeed, to see that they have stood up to be counted.

Pres. Orr's name is among the list, but Sec'y Orr's name is missing.

Suppose the secretary would not vote against N. Y., and there would be no use voting for it.

Wonder what coops will be used at the World's Fair?

Beg pardon, Com. of 3. I should say, at the "Universal Exposition of 1904."

They are very quiet on that score. Many of the bovs would like to know.

There seems to be a nigger in the fence somewhere.

Two of the greatest surprises the past week, i. e., Zimmer and Nichols voting for New York. Well! well! did you ever!

Say, Drev., where is that guy from Hoboken? If he gets the same pay as I do it is time he "done his trick." He is a lobster, anyhow.

GEYER'S SCURVY CURE FOR POULTRY was the first article introduced to the public for this purpose, which has been thoroughly tested in the last ten years by many of our brother fanciers who are willing to say with us that there is no other article on the market like this that can be relied on to do its work properly. It is something that the poultry fancier, who appreciates his fine birds, needs very much. What looks more disgraceful than a fine flock of chickens, many, or all of them, having their legs coated with a thick, hard, scabby crust which is called scurvy? It spoils the appearance of the birds and is very annoying to them. It is also contagious. Here we have a sure cure for this ugly disease. By following the directions we guarantee that it will take off that ugly, hard coat and leave the legs clean and smooth and give them their natural color. It also has no equal for healing sores and frosted combs and wattels. It makes them very bright and red. It is just what the exhibitor wants to prepare his birds for the exhibition room. Some of our customers tell us that they have tried it with good results for weak legs. We only ask you to give it a trial. It is put up in tin boxes. Money must accompany all orders. Price, 25 cents. Address, G. A. Geyer, Florin, Pa. 560tf

By Using Geyer's Champion Disinfectant & Vermin Destroyer

There are, in all classes of powders before the public, many calculated for the sure cure of lice and vermin and a dozen other purposes, yet are they reliable, and have they produced the results claimed?

In offering this compound, we offer a powder such as is not before the public, and fills a place that none other can for the purpose intended—a positive, sure disinfectant and destroyer of all vermin that invests either poultry, small animals, those of the barn yard.

It is a perfect destroyer of all disease germs, and produces a healthy odor wherever distributed. It is a sure cure for gapes, in young chicks.

If you are skeptical and don't believe in Powders or compound because of many worthless ones on the market, we ask, please cast aside your prejudice and give this compound a trial. It is put up in 2 pound boxes. Price 25c. 560tf

Plymouth Rocks.

How They Looked and What They Were Ten Years Ago.

By H. A. S. Been.

The modest and Quaker-like attire of our distinctly American Plymouth Rocks would hardly lead one to suppose that they should be the most popular fowls in this country. Yet such is the case. The brilliant plumage of the Games and Hamburghs and the wonderful pencilling of the Brahmas and Partridge Cochins, handsome and striking as they all are, cannot displace the Plymouth Rock in public favor. To many people this is inexplicable, but after all there are reasons for it and the chief one is---the name. Plymouth Rock has a magnetic ring to it and is thoroughly American. That explains it, for the fowls of the honored name are an American production. They are the result of crossing and the different modes which have produced the celebrated Rocks are given by Mr. Felch as follows:

"1. Black Spanish on White Cochin, top crossed with Dominique.

2. Black Spanish on Gray Dorking, top crossed with Dominique.

3. Dominique on Buff Cochin hens, reaching the result through the strong breeding color quality of the Dominique by years of breeding.

4. White Birmingham on the Black Java, top crossed with Dominique.

5. White Birmingham on the Black Java, and the progeny bred together, the progeny coming white and black, and Dominique." The latter cross Mr. Felch claims to be best and really the one that produces the best plumage and legs. We are inclined to this belief also, as strains established from the latter have bred a higher and evener grade of birds than any other. The first three crosses mentioned are decidedly objectionable, as the mingling of such blood as that of Black Spanish, the Buff Cochin and the Gray Dorking would show for years in the progeny. The color of the Plymouth Rock is a "symphony" of black and white so delicately applied in fine specimens that the famous blue tint, is the result. Thus far no adequate description of the plumage has been given, i. e., a description of the true color. We know it is black and white, and then again we think it is an indescribable something else. Our Standard says it is "a grayish-white, each feather regularly crossed with parallel bars of blue-black, producing the effect of a bluish-tinged plumage." Well, that's about as near as we can describe the color in words. A painting may represent nature in beautiful colors and artistic conception, but still fail to find the true color that nature claims her own. So let us abide by the Standard description of the Plymouth Rock. The Standard also states that male and female should be alike in color. If we state that to produce the best standard birds it is only necessary to mate the best standard birds together some breeders may object. It is, however, a fact that such a mating produces the best results, provided the breeder knows what standard birds are. There it a little difference of opinion regarding the shade of standard color, some preferring a rather dark bird, others a lighter bird. This depends in a great measure on the number of bars to each feather. Birds whose feathers are crossed by but three or four bars that are irregular in outline will have a lighter appearance, while a bird having 10 to 12 bars will present a much darker appearance. We do not wish to confound the smoky-tinged feathers with the above, but allude only to the "true blue" tinge. We remember seeing a hen a few years ago that looked rather dark at a first glance, but on taking her from the coop we found the most exquisite barring on the feathers, some of the feathers in the back showing thirteen distinct bars and every one of the latter was straight and even. It is such feathers that delight the fancier and to produce such means skill in mating and care in selection of breeding stock. We know of one veteran breeder who tried hard to purchase this hen, simply for the purpose of using her to produce a strain of male birds that should have straight bars on the hackle and saddle feathers. The bars on the latter are more or less V shaped and we doubt seriously whether they will ever be otherwise, especially on the hackle feathers. It is, however, an ideal to be reached and even if not entirely approaching it, much will be gained in this direction by the attempt. The hackle, saddle and the tail of the Plymouth Rock male as a rule decide his fate in the show room. The tail is usually the weakest section and many good all-round birds show the white feather in that important section. This probably accounts for the epidemic that annually deprives many Plymouth Rocks of their sickle feathers when on exhibition.

Another weak spot is the color of the legs and toes. They should be an orange yellow, but unfortunately they are often a dingy or smoky yellow, covered with black scales. What is worse still is that often the very finest plumaged females have bad legs. Those who have hatched and raised Plymouth Rocks know that the legs of the chicks seldom are yellow, in fact they are often nearly black or of a dark flesh color. In cockerels this occurs less or soon begins to change and the yellow appears prominently by or before the tenth week. In pullets it is often delayed until they begin to lay. There are strains, however, that will breed a fair percentage of rich yellow legs and a rich surpassing plumage also, but is the exception, not the rule. The beak should, of course, be yellow, but in the females it seldom is entirely so. The ear lobes must be red, no solid white being admissable. In the

WHITE PLYMOUTH ROCK COCK

A Noted Winner. Owned and Bred by Elm Poultry Yards, Hartford, Conn.

Barred Plymouth Rocks we find the ear lobes as a rule what they should be; in the White Plymouth Rocks,however, the white is of a rather too frequent occurrence. It is for this little point alone that objection should be made to the crosses containing Black Spanish blood, as the laws of reversion would ten to make that in the ear lobe crop out when least expected. The comb of a Plymouth Rock should be small, firm and evenly serrated, having 5 or 6 points. Large combs are not desirable. The shape of the Plymouth Rock male is a matter not easily described in words and even a picture will fail to suit the different judges, no matter how perfect it may be. The Rock is a heavy and meaty bird, but not a clumsy one. The breast should be broad, well rounded, but not too prominent; the thighs solid and resting on a pair of legs that are well spread and not "knock kneed," the hock showing clearly in the outline. The neck should be of medium length, having abundant hackle, and be nicely arched. The back should be broad and slope gently until near the tail, where it should rise with a sharp sweep from the hackle to the tail, but at the saddle being slightly lower. The tail is of medium size, the sickles extending well over the tail and nicely arched. Some judges favor a roach back, but the latter would never conform to the Standard description of "a slight concave sweep from the cape to the base of the tail."

BRAHMAS, COCHINS, LANGSHANS.

At Last Have a Book "All to Themselves, and It Is the Best Yet.

Our readers who year after year have stood by these truly thoroughbred fowls, the Brahmas, Cochins and Langshans, will be delighted to know that at last there has been published a book worthy of these old-time standard fowls, a book that has no room for other breeds, but takes in all varieties of the breeds named. It is the book we have been waiting for, anxious to place it early in the hands of those of our readers who maintain that there are none to compare with the good old substantial, feather-legged Asiatics—progenitors of the best there is in poultrydom to-day.

This new book, "The Asiatics," gives Full Details of Their Origin; Peculiarities of Shape and Color; Egg Production and Market Qualities. It treats extensively on Breeding and Mating for Best Results, and goes deeply into the subject of Exhibiting,in addition to giving Detailed Illustrated Instructions on Judging. It is a Standard in itself, and is contributed to by leading breeders, exhibitors, and judges who have made their names famous through their experience.

To say that it is fully ilustrated conveys but a slight idea of its pictorial contents. It contains two full page color plates, each worth the price of the complete book, and fourteen full page Illustrations by Franklane L.Sewell, America's leading poultry artist, also over fifty additional drawings and photographs of specimen feathers and winning birds at the leading shows. The cover is in three colors.

The wealth of reading matter in its ninety-six pages cannot be given here. Suffice it is to say that the contents cover the subject, and that the regular price of the book (50 cents, postpaid) is many times represented in a single article. The value of the book is far greater than its price.

(This book will be sent free to anyone sending us one dollar for a yearly subscription to The American Fancier.) Address: American Fancier, Johnstown, N. Y.

LIVE STOCK BUILDINGS AT THE WORLD'S FAIR.

Ample provision is made for the displays of live stock at the World's Fair by a well located site, situated on the highest point of the grounds and adjoining one of the main entrances. The floor space of all the exposition palaces covers less than 120 acres, while the several live stock shows will occupy about 200 acres, or 60 acres more than all the balance of the World's Fair exhibits under roof. The extent and value of the Live Stock Show of the exposition is only partially understood by a very limited number of students of animal husbandry. Some idea may be gained from a brief summary of the provisions made for buildings.

LIVE STOCK FORUM.

The largest building on the site has been designated the Live Stock Forum, which is "to accommodate the court by which the comparative merits of the various competitive exhibits of live stock are to be judged, and the awards announced to the public in attendance."

The Live Stock Forum is located a short distance west of University Boulevard and with an adjoining station for the intramural road. The ground plan is elliptical and encloses an area of 250x500 feet. It is the largest amphitheatre ever provided for displays of live stock. Only that portion of the arena given over to seats is roofed over, and the ring will be covered with sawdust or tan bark.

This is the only structure provided for the live stock department that can be given any notable degree of architectural effect comporting with Exposition construction. The building is given pronounced elevated effect by the use of upright columns in the interior wall construction.

The Forum is very substantially constructed and provided with eight tiers or raised amphitheatre seats encircling the arena. The arena is surrounded with a six-foot promenade on a level with the ground floor. A substantial partition or fence separates the arena from the lower promenade. The upper promenade is within one foot of the upper tier of seats of the amphitheatre and twelve feet in width.

Two main entrances to the Forum are provided for visitors, one located at the main center of the east side and one at the center of the north end of the Forum. There are twelve minor entrances for visitors, with suitable stairs from the lower to the upper promenade, on each side of the four main entrances and on one side of the twelve minor entrances.

The outside of the Forum is enclosed and the amphitheatre seats are amply protected. Provision is made for both day and evening exhibitions.

THE STOCK BARNS.

The barns provided for the World's Fair exhibits of live stock are mainly 200 feet long by 46 feet wide, and provide for 3000 stalls 5 feet wide and 10 feet deep, and 350 box stalls 10x10 feet, five at each end of and on opposite sides of each barn. They are well ventilated, with good day lighting by windows, and electric lights by night.

Water is supplied by hydrants inside of and at each end of the barns; also by hydrant with watering trough, on a washing platform with grade and sewage facilities for carrying waste water away from the platform.

The stalls have stationary hay mangers full width of the stall and 36 inches high for horses, and are provided with loose feed boxes, 18x12 inches and six inches deep for grain. In each box stall are loose feed boxes for each end of the manger. The box stalls are constructed with open work in front from four feet above the ground, for convenience of seeing the animals within. Each open stall is provided with a lifting front door 4 feet high, for use during the show of swine and sheep. The dirt floors of the barns are to be maintained smooth, rolled, and covered with not less than three inches of saw dust or tan bark.

A line of guard posts, 4x4, is set three feet in the rear of the stall partitions, 15 feet apart—the posts 3½ feet in height with hole three inches from the top and 1-inch guard rope extending east and west is provided with hook and staple to fasten at each end of each 30-foot section of rope.

The loft of each barn extends from the sides of the barn over the stalls and toward the center of the barn 12 feet. Pulleys with ropes and hooks are provided on either side of each barn for hoisting feed and baggage to the loft which will be used as sleeping quarters for the herdsmen and the storage of the current supply of grain and forage. A stationary ladder leading to the lofts is located on each side at the end of each barn.

Barns are numbered on each end, and each stall is to be numbered with figures not less than four inches in heighth. Sign boards are placed at each end of each block giving its designation, thus: "East Block," "Central Block."

Each barn is to be provided with a flag staff 12 feet high at either end, with rope and pulley.

LIVE STOCK REVIEW PARK.

The Live Stock Review Park is provided for the purpose of assembling for close personal inspection of the press and the public the horses and cattle as judged and immediately after the awards in each section have been made. The stock will be conducted directly from the Live Stock Forum as judged to the Review Park adjoining and be ranked in the order of merit as determined by the judge. Every facility will be provided for the press and public in the Review Park to give the animals critical and deliberate examination, to confer with the judge and to determine the respective merits of the entries and complete for publication a detailed review of the work of the judge in the Forum.

The Review Park is located near the Forum and is enclosed with a woven wire fence four feet high with sliding ten-foot entrance gate at the center of the east side and a similar gate for exit located opposite and in the center of the west side of the enclosure.

A roofed platform twelve feet in width is placed entirely across each end of the park, and on each writing tables and chairs are provided for the use of the representatives of the press.

Crop (Diseases of). —The bird seems to be always trying to swallow something. Many causes conduce to crop disorders—poison, an over-liberal supply of black or red pepper, or even too much spice. As a general rule, if there is to be any hope of recovery, the bird must be fed by hand, and here, once more, attention must be called to the fact that a fowl can easily be choked during the process of hand feeding unless care be taken with its tongue.

NUTWOOD FARMS,

R.F. D. No. 4, Syracuse, N. Y

The best remedy in case of poison is to give a teaspoonful of magnesia in hot water, and in any case the food should be principally composed of boiled bran, finely chopped boiled cabbage, beef tea, and boiled linseed meal, for at least a week, four times a day. The bird must be fed by hand.

The fowl must have plenty of green food, but this should be cooked, or inflammation may be set up.

In the case of dry grass balling in the crop, an operation is sometimes needful. Take the bird on your knee, having first tied its legs together, and pour down its throat a teaspoonful of hot water; after ten minutes' rest knead the crop gently for a few minutes, say five, and continue to do so at intervals of two hours during daylight. If this does not cause the obstruction to pass, lance the crop, take out everything which it contains, and then sew up the wound, being careful to sew the two skins separately, and not to let the stitches lie over one another. If fed as advised above, the bird will soon recover its health.

Diarrhoea can usually be stopped by giving one meal of well-boiled white rice, strained very dry, over which a little powdered chalk has been sprinkled. In very bad cases proceed as for dysentery.

Diarrhoea with young birds often comes from unsuitable or sloppy foods, from too much heat in the foster-mother, or from filthy sleeping quarters and runs.

Dropsy, which can be brought on by damp runs, or may be the outcome of kidney disorder, affects both chicks and grown birds, and may be apparent either in the feet or all up the legs; it may even come from a touch of frost-bite. It may generally be cured by increasing desire for exercise, and by feeding on more greenstuff, lean meat, and other non-fattening matter. A dose or two of castor oil will be advisable. Dropsy rarely makes its appearance when birds have plenty of opportunities of hunting for their food among dry litter of some sort.

Too much stress cannot be laid on the fact that light, airy quarters and scratching sheds are an absolute necessity if disease is to be prevented. This is generally only a matter of shillings, whereas deaths may run into pounds.

If abdominal dropsy occur, it is usually traceable to filthy quarters and bad feeding, but in this case also is secondary to some internal disorder. The only cure is to tap the dropsical parts with a needle, previously boiled in water, but as birds so affected must never be used for breeding purposes, it is questionable whether treatment of any kind is worth one's while.

Dysentery may be treated, so far as mild attacks are concerned, in the same way as diarrhoea, but all drinking water must be boiled.

The droppings are often frothy, and may show signs of blood. Give Douglas' mixture in the drinking water, keep the bird dry, out of draughts, and fairly warm, and give it one pill from the following recipe once a day. Cure is generally certain, but somewhat slow:

Powdered chalk	5 grains
Rhubarb	4 grains
Cayenne pepper	2 grains
Opium	½ grain

If these pills cannot be obtained in time, give from one to five drops chlorodyne, according to whether the bird be chick, fowl, or turkey.

The Douglas' mixture tonic may be continued for a month.

Egg-bound, due to the inflammation of the egg passage, or to the accumulation of surplus fat in and around the intestines, is more common in the late winter than at any other season. If birds be provided with large, airy, sunny scratching quarters, and are fed on non-fattening rations, with a good supply of grit and oyster-shell, there should be no trouble of this sort, though sometimes the disorder may be caused by the straining in passing a very large egg. If caused by internal fat, the bird will usually die on its nest.

Pullets which become egg-bound at the beginning of their "laying" generally come right of themselves; but if the hen be really over-fat cure is out of the question.

The only way of any service to pass the egg is to dip the finger in oil and to put it up the oviduct, so breaking the egg; every particle of shell must, however, be got out, or inflammation will be set up. Hold the vent over boiling water, feed the bird—which must be put away from its mates—on light food, giving it only tepid water to drink, with additional greenstuff and lean meat. When putting it back into its coop, after treatment, give a dose of fifteen grains of Epsom salts, and do not allow it with other birds for at least a week.

Feather-eating is often the result of confinement and insufficient green food. Give all birds so affected some well scalded clover-hay chaff in their morning warm mash, and see that birds have a wider range, if possible, and plenty of good grit. As a matter of fact, scalded hay should be given to all kinds of poultry every day from October to the end of March, but it must be well scalded overnight. Clover-hay is best, but ordinary meadow-hay will do very well.

Frost-bite sometimes comes, especially with Minorcas, from cold north or east winds, and is not by any means confined to the winter months. Keep the affected ones in warm, dry quarters, with plenty of light and air, but out of direct sunlight; give them more greenstuff, and if the comb be very black, but only in this case, add one-half teaspoonful of muriate of ammonia to every pint of their drinking water. Their combs may be dressed with the following ointment:

Glycerine	2 tablesponnsful
Turpentine	½ tablespoonful

Gastritis is an enlargement of the food passage between the crop and the gizzard. Birds so affected must be fed entirely on soft food, but should have no bran or sharps, and all the meals used should be well sifted to eliminate husk. Hay chaff boiled in skimmed milk is excellent as the staple food-stuff. Be most careful to see that the bird does not catch cold, or it will probably die despite all your care.

Moulting, especially in bad weather, is a severe strain on the bird's constitution. Give Douglas' mixture twice a week in all the drinking water, and add to the soft food, which should be given warm, one teaspoonful of the following to every ten birds:

Ground linseed	7½ lb.
Ground gentian	1 lb
Ground coriander seed	2½ lb.
Ground fenugreek	2½ lb
Ground capsicum	2½ oz.

Give scalded hay chaff, lean meat, or cut green bones, charcoal, and plenty of grit, and birds will generally feather out well and quickly.

Pip, not being a disease, requires no special treatment. As, however, it is usually a sign that the birds are out of order in some way, watch your flock, find out what is the matter, and treat them accordingly.

It is well to rub a little glycerine on the hardened tip of the tongue occasionally.

Pneumonia (inflammation of the lungs) is shown by a short, hacking cought. Remove the birds to dry, warm quarters at once. Be most careful to thoroughly disinfect the houses from which the birds were taken, and to burn the bedding and droppings.

Chicks with hens allowed their liberty in wet weather often die of this complaint, which more often than not is called "gapes" or "pip."

Feed the sick birds for a week on little else than beef tea or meat extract, in which a raw egg has been whipped up, and give them this food every two hours for the first day. Let the birds eat if they will, but if they show no sign of wanting to do so, feed them by hand, or they will die.

Give a dose of one drop of tincture of aconite in a teaspoonful of water every two hours for the first day, and if birds be very ill paint them over the lungs with iodine, afterwards gently rubbing in a little vaseline to keep the skin from cracking, and be exceedingly careful to keep the patients out of draughts.

Scaly leg can be easily cured, but it not treated promptly will very likely infect the whole yard. Directly it makes its appearance catch up the affected birds, rub their legs with kerosine, and, when the oil has soaked in, with strong sulphur ointment, and keep the birds isolated until they are cured.

On no account rub the legs with hot water and a hard brush, as was formerly supposed to be necessary; it is a most cruel and quite useless proceeding.

In stubborn cases it is well to repeat the treatment in four days' time.

Soft eggs are sometimes the result of fright, more often of over-stimulating food or want of lime. They are of rare occurrence where birds are given scalded clover hay chaff with their soft food.

Add an abundance of this food to the other rations, and see that birds have plenty of oyster-shell and grit; remember that on no account must maize or wheat be fed for a time. Twice a week give a large teaspoonful of sulphate of magnesia in the drinking water to every ten birds.

Douglas' mixture, which every poultrykeeper should have in his medicine chest or near at hand, for it is the most valuable tonic known, is prepared as follows:

½ lb. sulphate of iron (green copperas).

The whole should be well mixed with a gallon of hot water should be well shaken before use, and must be kept in an earthenware or glass jar—for it would eat its way out of a tin in a very short time—labelled "Poison."

The usual dose is one tablespoonful of the mixture to a gallon of water, but for special use, such as in the case of "white comb," that dose may be doubled. As a rule, it should not be given more often than twice a week. It is of the greatest use for young or breeding ducks during raw, wet weather.

In order that birds may be kept in the best of health, it is advisable to add 1 oz. of table salt to the hot morning food of every 100 birds.

SATURDAY, JULY 23, 1904.

The American Fancier's title is registered and copyrighted. The contents are presumably the same. We have never deemed it necessary to call attention to the above and would not now, had not some slick manipulators of the shears, published as original, some of our squibs and articles. We do not care how much others clip, provided they give due credit; neither do we believe in a Chinese wall copyright, but simply request the usual courtesy that governs decent journalism, poultry or otherwise. That's all.

The American Fancier is the only weekly paper devoted to thoroughbred poultry culture in America. This is simply a reminder to a few advertising agents and several publishers who for reasons of their own or want of knowledge on their part, are not aware of the above.

We are rather surprised at the Indian Runner Duck illustration that holds the place of honor on the title-page of our esteemed contemporary, The Feather, for July. When did you scare that up, Brer Howard?

And again our good old friend, the Ohio Poultry Journal, labels a nice Blue Andalusian cut, "A Leghorn Winner." The illustration is very familiar and a good one of an English bred Andalusian. But where does the Leghorn come in?

The statements made by "West Point" in our July 16 issue, regarding the assertion of Mr. G. M. Curtis that all the illustrations in the New Standard are by Mr. Sewell, is likely to cause more or less comment and trouble. Mr. Curtis made this statement, so we are informed, to the editor of "Poultry," England, and the latter published it. We have but the kindliest feelings toward Mr. Sewell and have always recognized his ability as an artist, and always will, but it is rather unfair to him and to other artists to allow such a statement as above chronicled to pass without notice. We trust Mr. Curtis will straighten this matter out when he returns from England.

On a recent trip through Northern New York we stopped off at Glens Falls, New York, and spent some very enjoyable hours with Dr. A. H. Phelps and Dr. Little, the former of Bantam, Faverolle and Lakenfelder fame, the latter an enthusiast on Pheasants and ornamental fowl of all kinds. If fanciers desire a real treat, stop off at the beautiful village that produces millions of tons of paper each year, and visit with the two doctors. No fees necessary; the only stipulation for the consultation being a love for the rare, beautiful and useful in feather-dom.

Dr. Phelps' series of ranches occupy some of the choicest land in Glens Falls. Eighty-seven pens of birds are scattered thereon. The buildings, the runs and the fences alone make a fine study for the student of economical poultry architecture. Built at a minimum of cost, with a maximum of comfort, is the first striking feature. The famous piano box houses are seen there in the fulness of their value. How the doctor ever managed to get all those musical instrument covers in so short a space of time, he alone can tell. Two are used to make either a single or double pen. Neponset red paper covers the timber. The insides are sprayed with a prepared lime-wash by a handy boy on the end of an effective pump.

The runs are quite large, and are completely covered, sides and top, with an inch wire mesh netting. The chickens are fed cut lawn clippings, but in addition have wire covered frames in each run, where juicy corn, wheat, oats and lettuce grows continuously for their use. Fresh water is supplied every day in large, open, granite-ware pans. Feed is supplied in gravity hoppers, a variety of grains, grit and charcoal being constantly before them. This reduces work of feeding to a minimum.

We glanced at these eighty-seven pens of thoroughbred fowls and also saw hundreds of young chickens growing in other pens, and a healthier crowd of feathered bipeds cannot be imagined. But the doctor does not raise his chickens entirely on city lots; he has made arrangements with several expert poultry farmers to raise several thousand chickens this season, and when the leaves begin to fall there will be a lot of good 'uns to select from for the winter shows.

It would take pages to describe all the different varieties the doctor has, and we will content ourselves to make a note of a few of the rarer varieties as we found them. As to the Bantams, we think his Black Japanese are the stars in the collection, the one cock bird being the finest shaped male we ever saw, a true Japanese, small and grotesque, and absolutely sound in plumage. This bird was considered the best in England before emigrating to America.

The Faverolles attracted our attention decidedly. We have seen the "bearded ladies of France" before, and at times did not think they would hit the popular fancy. But the great advance made in England recently in the striking features of the breed and the establishing of fixed characteristics, are seen in the several pens of Salmon Faverolles Dr. Phelps secured from the best breeders in England. There is something very practical and solid in the appearance of these birds. We saw one lot of chicks, eleven days old, that in size and development exceeded anything we ever saw in the chicken line before. They were monsters in comparison with chicks of other varieties of the same age. The doctor, in answer to a question, replied that the fertility of the eggs from the imported birds was very good. In testing some of the eggs in an incubator we found the average to run high, and letters from customers indicate that such has been the case in other sections of the country.

One of the rarities is the Black Faverolle, an immense bird in size, vigorous, and for market purposes likely to be of value. But the real Salmon Faverolle, such as Dr. Phelps will make a specialty of, is likely to become the popular favorite of all the varieties of this new French breed.

The several pens of Lakenvelders interested us greatly. This odd and striking German fowl is likely to find many admirers. The black hackle, saddle and tail on a white body, makes the male a very attractive bird, and visitors at the yards usually stop to take more than one look at "the shadow on a sheet" breed. As to the laying qualities of the Lakenvelders, it is too early to say whether they will equal the famous Hamburg progenitors, but one thing is certain, the eggs they lay are larger.

All the rarer, as well as the commonly known varieties of pheasants, find congenial homes at Dr. Little's avaries. To describe the beauties of the Swinhoe and Impeyan pheasants by pen or brush is an impossibility. To appreciate the wondrous iridescence of the colors is to see these birds in full plumage bask in the sunlight. A bird of beauty, albeit smaller and less gay, is the peacock pheasant. A very rare pair of birds are the Vulturine Guinea fowls. But few are in this country, and Dr. Little's pair only recently came from the Royal Zoo at Antwerp, Belgium. They are the most striking fowls in color and shape allotments we ever saw. The color of breast is almost an ultramarine blue, which extends to the cape and lower hackle feathers, the latter being white with heavy black stripe; body, back and wings are similar to Pearl Guinea fowl plumage; head and neck bare, except a collar of Titian red fur-like.

Dr. Little also maintained a pen of Gallus Bankiva, the original jungle fowl, and acknowledged forefather of all our domesticated races of fowls today. They look like enlarged Black Red Game Bantams of the old English type, but the males differ when moulting in assuming the garb of female, so Dr. Phelps explained to us, and "Doc" is an encyclopedia of natural history second only to Homer Davenport. Mandarin and Wood ducks are also in Dr. Little's collection. The tufted Australian pigeon would perhaps throw pigeon cranks into a fit by its enormous size and peculiar plumed blue crest, but some "wise guy" with ar eye to business will work that "birdy" in as a boss squab proposition some fine day. There are numerous other attractions in the zoological line at Dr. Little's that would interest and instruct "the talent" that we must advise the latter to see and learn, for we confess our limitations when it comes to rare parrots, cage birds and fur-bearing animals. It was, however, a rare treat to talk with their owner, a whole-souled gentleman who loves nature and animals in a true and manly way.

The Boston and New York shows have done more to popularize our new breeds than any other associations combined, and it is from just such men as manage these large exhibitions that we get our best ideas. They not only make a class for the new variety, but they use their best efforts to secure them and in the right way, encourage their owners to show.—Theo. Hewes in Inland Poultry Journal for July.

This is Big Theo's opinion regarding the classification at the shows mentioned when writing on Anconas. We are glad he feels that way and incidentally wish to make a few remarks on Anconas. The American Fancier has for the past ten years called attention to the value of Anconas as a utility fowl, as well as a show bird. Before we started this paper and while connected with the Fancier's Journal, published at Philadelphia, Pa., we dwelt on the merits of this fine variety. In fact, we owned some while at Hammonton, N. J., in 1890. Furthermore, we made up the Standard for Anconas at the Revision Committee's meeting held at Fisher's Island, N. Y., in 1897. The same standard accepted at the annual meeting held at Boston, 1898, is again in force in the new Standard ratified at Rochester, N. Y., in 1904. Furthermore, at Trenton, N. J., last year we asked Mr. Crawford, secretary of the New York show, to provide classes for Anconas, which he did. Prior to that Anconas were in the other variety class at New York.

That is the unbeaten record of the Prairie State Incubators: 20 sold first year—20,000 sold in 1903. * * *

There are hundreds of Anconas bred in New York state, and the only thing that kept them from public gaze was the non-recognition by poultry shows and the absence of a club to boom them. They have far more intrinsic merit to-day, breed truer and pay better as egg producers than a number of other more favored varieties of fowl.

TABASCO SAUCE.

Georgie Howell has left his beaten track and gone into the puffing business.

Say, Howell, did you land an advertising contract?

The Canadian Poultry Review gives notice that no more puffs or free write ups will be given. I say, Amen.

Not long ago a paper published in the state of Illinois received an advertisement from a poultryman.

And immediately gave him a rousing puff and free write up.

The editor who wrote the puff never saw the man, his chickens nor his plant.

Now is this square and honorable? I know it is not good business.

This new fancier remarked that by that "write up" he lost all faith in "puffs."

Inasmuch as if they would write him up so gloriously without any knowledge whatever, they will do it to others.

Editors: "Don't fall asleep at the switch."

All an advertiser ought to expect is just what he pays for. Nothing more, nothing less.

The government may be able to class frogs' legs with poultry, but Robby cannot make skim-milk masquerade as cream.

Say, Homer Davenport, Curtis says the Sussex fowls are no good. How about it?

Davenport and Phelps ought to get after Curtis' scalp.

What business has Curtis roaming around the country calling this or that breed "no good or a mongrel?"

Did you see that pair of Indian Runner Ducks in the Feather? Hully Gee, but ain't they great?

They must have been drawn by the score card.

If that com. of 5 are going to have any pictures of ducks here is their chance.

Speaking about score-card reminds me of a terse little article by Thos. Wilkinson of Nanaimo, B. C., in Northwest Poultry Journal.

Couldn't get an answer, eh, Tom? Why, of course not.

He says that Sharp Butterfield says that the score card is a farce and only uses it to please and satisfy his societies.

The Jarvis example also goes to show the fallacy of the score card.

Say, Drev., run this article in the American Fancier.

King Do Do, winner of shape special in The Poultry Tribune, puts me in mind of a monkey ready to take a header in the briny deep.

He may have shape, but he does not show it here.

Have another photo taken where he can show his shape.

Robby was rather moderate in his latest, only a little editorial space used on the poor old A. P. A.

He is trying now to get up a scrap with Bro. Bates.

Bates is a foxy sort of a gent and very seldom "falls asleep at the switch."

In looking over a poultry paper I saw an advertisement as follows: "Winter eggs and how to get them."

Also another, "A living from poultry."

Both books were written by (supposed) past masters in the art.

Both of these lobsters have to depend on other sources for their daily bread.

Wonderful what a lot of advice the writer can give out in a book which, if followed (if one can follow it) leads only to ruin.

Same old story: "Don't do as I do but do as I say."

Say, Drev., you ought to write a book. By golly, I believe it would sell better than any on the market now.

I'm going to write a book myself entitled "Poultry Graft," or why the lid was kept on.

We seem to be making history, but we are not appointing judges. Thomas, where art thou?

That's all right, Robby, about kickers in the early days of the A. P. A.

Get the history of the U. S. and you will find kickers on every good thing the country has ever done.

Look at the kicking done 100 years ago when the powers that were bought the Louisiana tract.

It seems to be chronic with some to kick at all things and your name is on the list as regards the A. P. A.

Why do you burden your readers with all this stuff?

Give the A. P. A. the "go by" and give a little more about hiring a man, mushroon culture, etc.

Say, Robby, I must thank you for the article "Ins and outs of 'High' Responsibility."

It just suits me to death. I have thought we had no use for those three ducks anyhow.

Would have been better to let Supt. Orr contract with Spratts.

There is no question but by the way they are manipulating the thing they are going to cut off the entries.

The whole shooting match is twisted and I am glad indeed that we are on the same side.

It's only 3 months now to the time when the clans meet at St. Louey.

I would suggest to the A. P. A. that they set a time when judging is to be done by the new standard.

The breeders must use the standard whether they will or not

How else can a show be judged?

They cannot be judged by the laws of Mass., Ill., or Moses.

There is no other way, absolutely none; it's the only pebble on the beach.

You can get up all the assn's you wish, ignore the A. P. A. all you wish, but the shows must be judged by its standard.

Get up a new standard, you say. All right, but it must necessarily be on the same line with the one we have.

You all can kick, tear your hair, throw bombs into the A. P. A., bust it up and make new history.

But poultry must be judged on the standard of to-day and its revisions of the future, by whatever name. it's called.

The foundation cannot be undermined and to Mr. J. H. Robinson and all others, I would advise, get in step with the real fanciers.

Haul yourselves into dry dock and get barnacles rubbed off.

Throw off the ballast of conceit and in the name of American poultry stop knocking.

Do not be a one-sided ferry boat that goes round, nor a lobster, but be a man.

WEST POINT.

TO POULTRY BREEDERS AND FANCIERS.

It has been decided to reopen a Poultry Department at the 31st Annual Great Grangers' Interstate Picnic Exhibition, Williams' Grove, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, August 30th, 21st, September 1st and 2d, 1904, inclusive. All entries to positively close August 26th, and specimens to be on the ground not later than 10 o'clock a. m. of Tuesday, 30th. Judging to begin at noon that date. Specimens to be returned Saturday, September 3d. A very moderate entry fee will be charged and good cash premiums will be paid. This department will be conducted under the auspices of the Pennsylvania Fanciers' Association, Geo. W. Kinter, Superintendent, and Jno. R. Gore, Manager. One bird to the coop. The association reserves right to put two birds belonging to same owner in a coop, if absolutely necessary. It is proposed to make these annual exhibitions the greatest poultry exhibitions in the United States, as the great popularity of the "Grangers' Picnic" at Williams' Grove is known over the whole United States. Owing to the early season of the year for showing poultry, due allowance for condition and moult of birds will be made and judges so instructed. As an advertising medium for the exhibitor and breeder, there is none which offers so great an opportunity to make sales and take orders as at this famous outing. Farmers gather from all over Pennsylvania and the four or five other Middle States. Kindly advise the Manager of this Department, Jno. R. Gore, Royalton, Pa., if you will make an exhibit, and, if so, whether large or small, and it will be much appreciated. If can be state about the number of birds, so arrangements for cooping, etc., can be made. Premium lists will be out by July 15th. If you fail to receive a copy of same, drop a card to R. H. Thomas, General Manager, Mechanicsburg, Pa., who will gladly mail same with entry blanks. Any other information desired will be cheerfully given by dropping card to Manager of this Department, Jno. R. Gore, Royalton, Pa. Study over the inducements offered from being an exhibitor at this great interstate picnic and make large entries. It will pay you during the coming season.

Yours truly,
R. H. THOMAS,
General Manager.
Mechanicsburg, Pa.

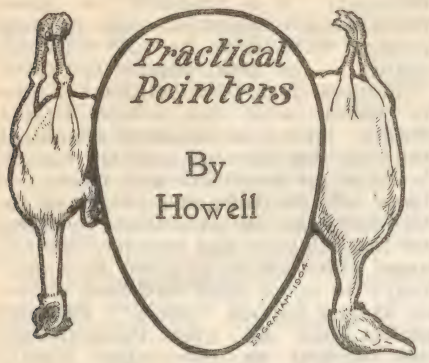
Editor American Fancier:

An error was made in your report of the Celeron show. The prizes on Golden and Silver Sebright and Black Tailed Japanese Bantams should have all gone to R. A. Armstrong of Alfred, N. Y. F. P. Studley of Matteawan, N. Y., won 1st cock, 1st hen on Black Minorcas. Rev. P. Contors, Trewsbury, N. Y., won 1st cock and 1st hen on W. C. Black Polish. Will you kindly make these corrections.



J. W. MORRIS.
Jamestown, N. Y.

POULTRY HIGH IN ENGLAND.

United State Consul Frank W. Mahin at Nottingham, England, has forwarded to the state department some facts that will be of interest to poultry raisers. He says that last year was particularly wet and cold, and the bad luck of the poultry raisers generally has resulted in increased activity looking to methods to overcome these shortcomings. Incubating plants are becoming more numerous than ever, while establishments for scientific rearing and breeding are increasing rapidly. Mr. Mahin says that really fresh eggs seldom retail for less than 60 cents a dozen, while they average nearer $1.20 a dozen. Good roasting fowls sell for from 60 cents to $1 each.

HOW EGGS TRAVEL.

A New York broker, says the Produce News, recently received a car of California eggs, 400 cases, which he sold at 30 cents a dozen. Strictly speaking, these were not California eggs. They were bought in Kansas in the spring, shipped to the coast and stored. The New York prices were so attractive that the eggs were shipped first to Chicago and then to New York. The freight on these eggs was quite a little item, amounting to $424. This hardly cuts much figure when it is understood that the 400 cases brought $3,600. Eggs are breaking all records this year. Getting $3,600 for a car of storage eggs is something remarkable. It would be interesting to know if these eggs reached the consumer as "strictly fresh," and what their quality proved to be.

Mr. Howell, associate editor of The American Fancier, will furnish weekly reports on the egg and poultry market, and answer all questions submitted to him relating to commercial and practical poultry keeping. When replies are requested to be sent by letter, stamps must be enclosed and letters addressed to George E. Howell, 70 Christopher St., New York City.

Eggs.—Receipts for week, 58000 cases. Eggs from sections contingent to this market are gradually diminishing in numbers. There are several reasons for this. The festive summer boarder is getting his at every mountain hamlet and swearing he never saw a fresh egg in the city; also moulting time is upon us and the egg machinery is not working overtime.

We quote nearby selected white 24c a dozen, an advance of 2c; mixed colors, same quality, 22c; best Western, 21c; ordinary, 17 to 19c; Southern, 14½ to 17c.

Poultry receipts, 28 cars live poultry, and 8500 packages dressed. The meat strike scare is tightening up prices, live fowls going to 14c lb.; chickens, 25c for nearby stock and Western; Southern Springers to 18 and 19c; live pigeons, 25c per pair; fresh killed turkeys, 14 to 15c per lb.; Philadelphia broilers, 28 to 30c; all nearby sections, 3½ to 4 lbs. to pair, 26 to 28c; Western dry picked, 20c; scalded, 19c; fowls, 12c; nearby and Eastern spring ducks, 16c; White Squabs, $2.50 to $2.75 per dozen; mixed, $2.25; dark, $1.50 per dozen.

To those poultrymen who have room to spare I would suggest the purchase of any desirable lots of young hens that can be bought at present market prices. There is, it seems to me, an excellent reason for so doing: The egg market is in such a promising condition, aside from the meat side of the question.

Old worn-out hens that are already conditioned for market, are of no value in a venture of this kind, but young stock in fair flesh will, upon being transplanted to a new home and freely fed, moult and commence laying with a fair prospect of continuing through the fall.

The meat strike may be settled at once, or not for some time. In the latter case, more eggs and more poultry will have to take the place of meat. A word to the wise is sufficient.

I have often noticed a wagon on its way to market from Secaucus, N. J., labeled "Duck and Chicken Farm." The town of Secaucus is synonymous with about all that is cheesy in the way of dairy and meat products coming to this market, nevertheless, I am going to look this fellow up at some opportune time, and if, as I suspect, he is raising and dressing his ducks and chickens at Secaucus, and driving in regularly to customers here in the city, if such be the case, I may be able to get a few clinchers to my arguments in favor of from "farm to table direct."

What Tip says about poultry in the New York Press:

The finest poultry that comes to New York goes over to the East Side, and goes alive and healthy. It is eaten by the Hebrews and Chinese principally. You could not give a Chinaman a dead chicken, much less sell him one. He must see the bird alive and kicking, and be satisfied of its healthy condition. His poultry is killed according to Chinese methods in the rear of the little Chinese restaurant, and its feathers and offal go far toward rendering unsanitary certain quarters of the city. An effort was made by certain philanthropists to obtain a permit from former Health Commissioner Lederle to erect a suitable slaughter house for the Chinese, but the proposition was not even countenanced.

Talmudic ordinances are scrupulously obeyed in the killing of poultry for the orthodox Jews of the East Side. Quaint looking men travel from house to house to do the butchering, being ordained for the purpose by the rabbis. The charge is 3 cents to kill a chicken and 5 cents to kill a turkey. The method is this: A few feathers are plucked from the under side of the neck, making a clearing for the knife. The neck is then stretched, and with a single stroke the jugular vein is severed. The neck bone is drawn through the slit, and the body of the dying bird is cast into a barrel of sawdust, or into ashes, so that the blood may be quickly absorbed. If any foreign substance, say, a piece of metal, is found in the crop, or gizzard, or if two strokes of the knife are required, the chicken is not kosher, but tref, and cannot be eaten.

Gentiles are utterly careless about meats and poultry. A summer visitor in the wilds of New Jersey tells me this: "I spent a month on a farm where there were some 2,000 chickens and ducks. The former often died at the rate of fifty a day, and I got to wondering what became of the carcasses. A quiet investigation revealed the horrible fact that they were picked and sent to market. Some of them I traced to a cheap restaurant near the heart of New York, where they were regarded as a delicacy by the patrons.

I have read a long plaint from a learned doctor on the ins and outs of the eggs for hatching business. What in the name of common sense is the use of digging up a corpse? The hatching season of 1904 is over and properly buried, why hold a post-mortem?

To the theory that farmers are afraid to patronize poultrymen lest they get stuck, I say, ask Dawley or Van Alystine of Farmers' Institute fame if, after a thorough canvassing and drumming up, they have given their goods at such gatherings the farmer is afraid of them. They will answer, Nay, nay.

The farmer is afraid to purchase pure bred poultry not from distrust of the people who have that kind to sell, but because they are not progressive and cannot see the benefit they may derive in the future. What looks like a long price to them now, once they are educated will dwindle into significance.

With the passing of each year the fanciers are getting more numerous, and the farmers see more of them and have more opportunities to see the light.

Subscriber, from Palenville, N. Y., asks if it is advisable to embark in the squab breeding business, and will the demand increase?

I answered yes to both questions. When it is considered that dealers today are asking five dollars a dozen for White Squabs, it looks to an outsider as if those now engaged in squab raising could do a profitable missionary work by looking up the consumers of this delicacy and serving them direct.

One hundred per cent increase over the price paid to the shipper looks to us like an alluring profit.

R. B. C., Baltimore, Md., asks: "Will the new Standard contain illustrations of the different breeds of turkeys?"

While I have not seen it mentioned in any of the yards and yards of tin-canned reports of the doings of the new illustrated Standard makers, I unhesitatingly answered yes. The book being representative, the turkey, duck and goose breeders are as much entitled to a sketch of their favorites as a Brahma or Leghorn breeder, and it is no conceivable that a work of this kind will be found otherwise when it reaches the hands of the public.

Recently saw it stated that fowls intended for fall exhibitions could by being penned for ten days on very scanty rations, then fed on heavy, oily foods like yellow corn, sunflower seed, oil cake, etc., be induced to moult and grow a nice new crop of glossy feathers.

It is worth a trial and sounds very plausible. It certainly is more humane than the custom of plucking, in vogue in some quarters. It's a case of being starved or stripped, with the old hen having no voice in the matter beyond a squeak.

SOME EXPERIENCES WITH CHILLED EGGS.

By F. J. Reveley.

I say experiences, and such I can honestly call them, as they were surely not experiments, for to try them as such would require more nerve than the average poultryman possesses, although some of them are not at all shy in this respect. As everyone knows, the spring has been a hard one as regards hatching and results have been far from satisfactory with many, even when the best care and attention has been given the eggs under incubation. I had only ordinary hatches during February and March, but I felt that I had no kick coming when I compared notes with some of my friends in this section either from the percentage of fertility, or of eggs hatched.

But to return to the subject—chilled eggs. I might as well say "cold" eggs—let me tell you first what happened under my hens. I set three good big Buff Wyandottes on 15 eggs each, all in one part of the coop partitioned from the rest, but not from each other, as I felt sure they would be all right, being quiet and usually contented.

After eight days of nice steady work they evidently felt the need of more exercise than I was allowing them daily. When I left home at noon everything seemed calm and serene, but when I returned at eleven p. m. (I do not go home to supper) I found all three nests (dirt and straw) completely destroyed, eggs scattered, broken and buried in about equal proportions. One old faithful had gathered together three stray eggs and was covering them. Further than that, not an egg was in sight. These conditions, so I was told by the one who fed them, were the same at 5 p. m., at least six hours before. This was in April and by no means warm or favorable weather.

Disappointed and mad, but not discouraged, I set about digging for eggs among the ruins and I found twenty-eight that I considered worth saving, rebuilt the nests, giving two hens fourteen eggs each, and felt sure I was only wasting the hen's time for the remaining 13 days, but as the eggs were from my best pen I hated to throw them away without giving them a chance. All went well for six days more, bringing them up to the fourteenth, when upon going home that night, I was met with this pleasant greeting: "Did you shut five of the white Fluffs in where the buffs are sitting?" You can imagine my negative reply and shudder. Then came the following for a finisher: "They were in there when I fed them and I took one out, then fearing I had done wrong, I put her back again."

Well, I went out and all she said was so and conditions were practically the same as before except that there was not an egg in sight and fortunately none broken. Again I rearranged the nests, dug around and found the twenty-eight cold eggs and put the two hens at work again, thinking that they might as well waste 3 weeks as two. No more fatalities happened and on the 21st day I examined the eggs and not one was pipped. The next morning one hen had one, the other, two chicks and all that day, the next and the next (mind you, 22d, 23d and 24th days) chicks continued to come out until 23 strong and smart were hatched from the 28 eggs. Some wise one will say, "Oh, yes, that's easy, having them buried in the dirt kept them warm," and possibly this is so, but he will have trouble with the following experiences: One hen left her nest for some hours, no one knows how many, another was put in her place, but she would not stay. Eggs, hen and all were transferred to new quarters and before many days she cancelled her contract and left. Still another was tried, the eggs carried to her and out of seventeen eggs she brought out 14 chickens, all on the 21st day.

So much for hens, now for the incubators. My good wife laid a wire on the balance beam and threw the damper cap "way up in the air" and held it there for eleven and one-half hour. Of course the eggs were cold, good and cold, and this on the twelfth day. I got a 68 per cent. hatch from that lot and as eggs were shipped a long distance and in none too good condition anyway, I do not think the hatch was injured a particle.

I hesitate to tell this next one, for it shows me up to bad advantage. I had 38 eggs in a small machine generally used as a "tender" to the larger ones. On Sunday, the fourteenth day under heat, I took out the eggs at 2 p. m. to turn and cool. While doing that a friend came and I went out to show him my fowls. He stayed some time. I was then called to dinner, wrote some letters, took a nap, had supper, and went to go to bed at 10:30, when I happened to think of those eggs which I had taken out 8½ hours before and had been on an unused incubator with the cellar temperature in the neighborhood of 50 degree. To cut it short, 28 chicks were hatched and after the hatch was off, the man tending the lamp tells me he let it go out one day until the eggs were cold, but does not know how long it was so and you can rest easy about me telling what I had done.

I believe in cooling eggs and cooling often and long. Such experiences as the above have taught me several lessons. I do not recommend such radical measures but do think that one degree hot will injure both hatch and chick more than 5 or 10 degrees cold for the same length of time, and that more depends on the care and attention given the breeding pen than to the incubator or setting hen.

THE PENCILED FOWLS.

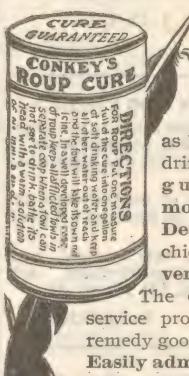
The Dark Brahma, the Partridge Cochin, the Indian Game and the Partridge Wyandotte, and the bantam forms of the breeds first named, make up the list of standard and penciled fowls. There is, also, an unrecognized variety of the Plymouth Rock and one also of the Wyandottes which are penciled.

In penciled fowls the plumage of the males and the females is different, and it is the female plumage which is penciled. The Partridge Cochin, Indian Game and Partridge Wyandotte cocks belong to the coloration known as the black-red, i. e., the breast, tail and underbody are black, and the hackle, back, saddle and wing bows are red, with more or less black marking. The Dark Brahma cock is colored like the others, except that silvery white is substituted for red.

Upon a gray or reddish ground color, the penciling of black or nearly black, in the plumage of the hens, is marked with exquisite regularity. These pencilings follow the contour of the rib of the feathers, and are penciled at regular intervals one within the other. In the Indian Games two or three of such markings are found, and two is the ideal number. In the other varieties, from three to five are expected and desired.

Such penciling, it seems to me, is the most perfect type of marking yet produced upon domestic fowls, a type to which all others are but preliminary steps. I do not assert that this is so, but only that such is my opinion. I cannot show proof of the statement, for I do not know that any breeder has started with one form, say the earliest, as I believe it to be, mottling, and from that form has bred spangled, barred, laced and finally penciled fowls, and that is what should be done for absolute proof. But in this series of articles I have shown that the various forms of marking are related to each other, and that some of them, at least, are interchangeable to a greater or less extent, and it is my belief, based upon such evidence as I have been able to collect, that penciling is the last stage in marking which has thus far been reached in the development of the domestic fowl. Be this as it may, a well penciled fowl looks like a work of art, and concerning its absolute beauty there is but one opinion.

Penciled fowls do not form a large class. One of the varieties is probably the best table fowls (from the American view point) we possess, and the others are classified as general-purpose fowls. But in all of the varieties, while many breeders do not forget the useful qualities, the fanciers strive to develop their exhibition points, and sometimes succeed in their attempts at the expense of the useful qualities. I remember a conversation I once had with a gentleman who for years bred the Partridge Cochin. I had asked him if they laid well, and his reply was: "No; they didn't lay eggs enough to make an omelet. I bred them for feathers, and not for eggs." And yet I know of a successful exhibitor of Partridge Cochins who assured me (and I have full confidence in his statements) that his fowls are good layers and really first-class general-purpose fowls. And I know that the Partridge Cochins which I used to breed were fair layers of good-sized tinted eggs, though not quite the equals of the Brahmas.



In breeding penciled fowls, the greatest success for exhibition purposes is obtained by making two matings, one for the production of show cockerels, and the other for the production of well penciled pullets. For cockerels, a black-breasted male with well-striped hackle and saddle—in a word, a male of the exhibition type, is mated to hens that are of good ground color, but deficient in penciling. For pullets, the best penciled females are mated to a cock whose breast is mottled, splashed or penciled, one that is utterly unfit for exhibition. One of the best breeders of Partridge Cochins in the United States, and who in his lifetime bred hundreds of winners, told me that he did not dare to sell a proper pullet-breeding male, because buyers would be utterly disgusted with him and would promptly send the fowl back. And I use just such males, and the results in breeding justify their use. It would be folly for a young man to take up any of these penciled varieties and expect to breed fowls that would compete successfully for prizes in the large exhibitions, from a single mating. While a single mating will produce very good fowls of both sexes, the finest exhibition birds are not so produced.

Whether a strain could be produced which would be able to breed the finest of both sexes from a single mating is not yet demonstrated. I tried to do this with the Pea combed Barred Plymouth Rocks, and the results were that in plumage my best specimens were always inferior to the best of the single-combed variety, and because of this inferiority the variety was finally dropped from the Standard. Had I been wise, and instead of trying an experiment had followed the method of the single-combed Barred Plymouth Rock breeders, I believe the Pea-combed Barred Plymouth Rocks would have remained a standard variety. I have heard of other breeders attempting to make such strains of barred or penciled varieties, but the products of their breeding have never been conspicuously successful in the larger shows. Yet such a strain, if it could be produced, would be very valuable, because the double-mating system requires the production of twice as many chickens as the single-mating system would require, in order to secure a given number of exhibition specimens.

Want of the knowledge of the present necessity of making two matings has led to much disappointment. Amateurs have frequently purchased at an exhibition a fine pen of penciled fowls and have bred them as mated for showing, in the expectation of being able to produce equally as good specimens. But they have produced only inferior chickens. Had they mated the males to the proper hens, and the females to a cock which was unfit for exhibition, they would have had more satisfactory results. The fowls which they purchased were matched for exhibition, not mated for breeding. When I became an officer in a leading poultry society, I found that prizes were generally offered for "breeding pens," but I advocated a change in the term and substituted "exhibition" for "breeding," and I am glad to know that in most poultry shows the term "breeding pen" has been dropped and the term "exhibition pen" is now used. But even this change in exhibition nomenclature has not been sufficient to prevent amateurs from making the mistake of buying exhibition pens for breeding, and suffering loss and disappointment from their lack of knowledge. There is still need of "line upon line and precept upon precept," and perhaps will be to the end of time, or until the production of single-mating strains, which event is as yet far off.

Penciled fowls, though they exhibit the highest type of beauty and are therefore favorites with fanciers, are not as widely popular as some other varieties. The lack of widespread popularity may be due, to some extent at least, to a lack of knowledge of the best methods of mating, and to an unwillingness to make double mating when such knowledge is possessed. This, however, is not a complete explanation, because we know that double matings are just as essential in the successful breeding of Barred Plymouth Rocks, and the Barred Plymouth Rock is nevertheless a very popular fowl. Just at present the Partridge Wyandotte is very popular, because, perhaps, among other things, of its recent admission to the Standard. The Indian Game was at one time the most popular fowl in the United States, enjoyed or suffered a boom, but has lost some of its boomday popularity. The Dark Brahma and the Partridge Cochin enjoy some popularity, but not such a degree of public favor as their beauty and usefulness ought to afford. In fact, as has been stated before, if there is a secret of the cause of popularity, it is one that has as yet been undiscovered.

The great beauty of penciled fowls, however, even if their popularity shall wax and wane from time to time, will prevent them from becoming extinct. So long as there are poultry fanciers, penciled fowls will continue to be bred, and the race of fanciers will never die out. Individual fanciers will come and go, but the race goes on forever. While, therefore, one could wish that these beautiful varieties enjoyed a popularity commensurate with their merits, there need be no fear of their ultimate extinction. So long as the world shall revolve upon its axis, and the sun give sufficient heat to sustain life, the penciled fowl will perpetuate its race.—H. S. Babcock, in the Country Gentleman.

"Oh, I wish I could find

Said the next little chicken,
With an odd little shrug:
"Oh, I wish I could find

Said the third little chicken,
With a sharp little squeal:
"Oh, I wish I could find

Said the fourth little chicken,
With a small sigh of grief:

Said the fifth little chicken,

THE CHOICE OF REPRODUCTION.

In order to obtain large-sized and well-made birds, it is necessary at first to have recourse to a cock irreproachable in shape, plumage, and carriage. It is not at all essential that it should be of colossal dimensions, although it is more desirable that it should be large than small. Ease of movement is also an important point, and large-sized cocks are too often defective in this respect. When one comes across a cock uniting all these qualities, one puts him with the largest hens that can be found, and as far as possible not consanguine with him. This union is sure to produce magnificent specimens, combining size, elegance, and beauty of shape. It goes without saying that all the subjects will not be equally successful, but, by choosing the best of them, and giving them from an early age all the necessary attention for facilitating their growth in the way of good nourishment and preservation of health, one should obtain absolutely remarkable fowls.

It may be said that as a general rule for obtaining large breeds, it is sufficient to give a vigorous and well made cock to as large hens as possible.—Revieh Agricole.

EGG-EATING HENS.

There are some hens which eat their eggs, much to the displeasure of their owners. One of them has invented the "cage-trap." In this the fowl is shut up, and the egg as soon as it is laid disappears through the bars of a double bottom. The hen wastes a lot of time searching for its egg, and it is said that after a fortnight of this treatment she becomes reasonable. It is added, however, that in some cases she remains intractable, and that as soon as she is liberated she continues to eat her eggs.

A breeder imbued with psychology has taken up the problem in another manner. He commenced by asking why it is that the hen eats her eggs. Why? It is obviously unnatural. He ascertained that hens in this condition nearly always laid eggs with a soft shell, containing no lime. He thought at first that the hen ate her eggs through self respect, because they were badly made, and so that nobody else should have them. He reflected. Why did the eggs of the voracious hen have an imperfect shell? And why was it that the hen which laid these imperfect eggs was voracious? Had it not the relation of cause to effect? The shells were insufficient through want of lime. This was, no doubt, because the hen did not get enough lime in her food. If she procured this lime the shell would become harder. The psychologic conclusion was then, that the hens eat their eggs in order to procure the lime which they are in want of. Was this a good argument? He gathered some oyster shells, dried them in an oven, crushed them, and mixed them with the hens' food. Not a single hen ate its eggs. This was perhaps the true means of preventing hens from eating their eggs, and squandering the products of the farm. Let us add that oyster shells may be replaced by lumps of dead lime, which are put in the proximity of the hen roost.—La Petite Gironde.

LEST WE FORGET: THE GREAT HAGERSTOWN FAIR TAKES PLACE

OCT. 11-12-13-14, '04.

The poultry buildings are the largest in the United States.
The cash prizes are the most liberal offered.
A prize won at Hagerstown is equivalent to one received at New York, Boston, Chicago, or any other great winter show.
It takes good birds to win at Hagerstown for the competion is not local—it is national.
It is a fanciers' show from end to end. Visiting fanciers are "at home" at all times.
The annual parade and banquet are the great features that bring "the clans."
Honors won are bread winners. They sell the stock.
Seven men judge the show, viz: G. O. Brown, J. H. Drevenstedt, D. A. Nichols, F. B. Zimmer, J. F. Craugle, Theodore Hewes and W. J. Stanton.
These men have judged before.
Premium lists will be ready August 1st.
The money you win is ready before you go.

BARRED AND BUFF ROCKS.

I have won the past season at the following shows: Fitchburg, Mass., Stamford, Conn., South Framingham, Mass., Manchester, N. H., New Bedford, Mass. The above Barred Cockerels were all sired by 3d cockerel, 1903, Madison Square Garden, New York winner, 63 cockerels in this class. Reliable Poultry Journal February, 1903, liked this cockerel above all others in the show. I have a few cockerels sired by above cockerel for sale from $4.00 upwards. Standard weight. of very even color, barred well all over. If you want to improve your blood these cockerels are what you want. Money returned if birds don't suit you. I have had my pens mated up by one of the leading Poultry Judges in America—4 pens headed by high scoring cockerels. I have also one pen of Buff Rocks. For the cockerel in this pen and two pullets I gave Mr. Higgins, of Orange, Mass., $75. I have not many sittings to dispose of therefore have your orders booked early. My eggs will be from same pens as I breed from myself. Choicest Eggs $2.00 a sitting.
